The Argyle Banner says that L. Loughbridge, who has been doing immigration work during the past winter has established eighty agents at important points in Iowa, Illinois and Wisconsin, who are activeiy interested in pushing into this valley a class of settlers who will fully develop the rich resources that now lie dormant beneath the unbroken sod. Excursion trains will begin about the middle of May and be run through the valley twice a month thereafter during the summer. A colony of 900 from New York will look this country over during the summer. This is not calculated to work a great boom but to invite a class of settlers here who are in a position to improve an opportunity to better their financial condition and materially conduce to the complete development of the finest agricultural region under the sun.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C. St. P. M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

For Map Folder of the line addres T. W. TUESDALE, Gen'l Passenger Agent St. Paul, Minn.

The boy friends of Scottie Hall participated in a surprise party in his honor last night, it being the 9th birthday anniversary. Scottie was much surprised but managed to recover his complacency and eked as much enjoyment out of the pleasnt affair as any of the guests. A sumptuous repast was served and the boys entertained in royal style.

Some Queer Derivations of Words.

The game cricket is not the chirping chatterer that makes music for the family fireside, but takes its name from the Anglo-Saxon crice, a staff (crutch), which we call a bat. The catamaran is not an animal, but a boat made of two hulls fastened together. This word is Hindostanee, and means floating trees. The word haberdasher has a rushing, roaring sound, like that of angry waves breaking upon a pebbly shore, but it bears no rough meaning. The haberdasher of today sells what we call goods for gentlemen's wear.

In the Icelandic, hapurtask is things of trifling value, and hapesk is a haversack to carry oats or provisions. Taska is a chest or a pouch; hafe, oats. In German bafersack is an oat bag. So the haberdasher was originally one who carried oats in a bag. But the German habe is goods, and tauchen is to exchange; berdash is a necktie, and a berdasher a necktie maker. So we can take our choice between the oat bag man and the maker of neckwear.

The expression is borrowed from the Italian, but spoiled in the transfer, "Sleeps like a top." A top does not sleep, but the dormouse does, and he sleeps as though he meant it. Egli dorme come un topo in Italian is in English "He sleeps like a dormouse;" but because topo is like our top, and because when a top is spinning at its best it does not wobble, but maintains the perpendicular and makes no noise, the Italian phrase was taken by certain wiseacres to have reference to a top.—Harper's Young People.

In a Berlin cafe coffee is brewed by electricity. A platinum wire passes in spiral through several glass jars, the electrical current quickly raising the water contained to a boiling point, and the coffee is thus prepared in the view of every one in the room; then a small electric railway transmits the coffee to the several tables, so that the guests may help themselves to their liking.

The Polish of the Cowry Shell.

The cowry, eggshell, or Cypræa is represented on this coast, but the finest specimens come from southern waters. It is the common shell of the New England mantelpiece, where, with the ten commandments or the constitution of the United States carved upon its back, it sits in silent protest against poor taste and the despoliation of an otherwise beautiful creature. It is generally supposed that the shell has been artificially polished, so perfect is the luster of the surface, but this is a mistake, as I have taken them from their native haunts by diving fifteen or twenty feet down, and the polish was perfect.

In this way I observed their method of preserving the polish. When in the water and moving about the shell was completely covered by a fleshy envelope thrown out by the animal, which kept it as spotless as a diamond. This is necessary, as I found the greater number in dead coral, rode in the breakers of the reef or at the base of living coral, upon which they appeared to feed.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

Science in Schools.

A scientist has been making a plea for the introduction of science into school courses. He says it should not be a matter of experimenting with gases and acids, with air pumps and electrical machines, but it should be brought home as nature's message to the hearts as well as to the minds of the young. It should teach them justice and impress on them that there is a right, that there is a true, that there are moral balances as well as chemical ones, and that there are conditions of moral stability and instability just as of chemical or mechanical or electrical. The teacher who cannot extract moral instruction and inspiration out of physical science ought to leave it alone—whether he is fit to teach anything is a question.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Treasure Trove in a Sofa.

A Kansas paper is responsible for a statistical statement regarding a long used sofa that recently was taken to the shop of an Ottawa upholsterer. "When taken apart there were found between the back and cushion 47 hairpins, 3 mustache combs, 19 suspender buttons, 13 needles, 8 cigarettes, 5 photographs, 217 pins, some grains of coffee, a few cloves, 27 vest buttons, six pocket knives, 15 poker chips, a vial of homeopathic medicine, 34 lumps of chewing gum, 9 toothpicks and 4 button hooks." What startling tales that sofa could tell if it was only gifted with speech!

THE biggest joke that ever owed its origin to Artemus Ward is the claim of the Illinois woman who says she married the humorist a year before he was born, and who now wants his estate.

A NEWSPAPER wag at Jeffersonville, Ind., says a gang of colored boys, none of them over 12 years old, stole a locomotive from the railroad yard there and then tried to sell it to a junk dealer for old metal.

SOME excitable Frenchman evidently has been telegraphing from St. Petersburg a hysterical defense of the Czar's treatment of the Jews and of his policy generally. This is probably one of the first results of the closer alliance between France and Russia.

PROF. ELY figures that it costs $100,000,000 per year to support the world's poor sent over to this country without ability to provide their own subsistence. If Italy should drop the acquaintance, there would be a large saving in this quarter, provided Italy retained its contribution.

THE Hindoos are about to adopt a modern notion in forming a "Hindoo tourists' party" for visiting Europe, America, China, Japan and the states. The "Hindoo noblemen and gentlemen" who are invited to join the party are assured that they will be able to travel without violation of caste rules.

SINCE his indictment Chauncey M. Depew has thoroughly explored the Fourth Avenue Tunnel in New York to ascertain its exact condition. A little such exploration prior to the accident would have been entirely in order and might have warded off the catastrophe.

MRS. GEORGE GOULD says she supposes her babies are just like other people's babies. Mrs. Gould is somewhat eccentric. The mother who doesn't think her babies a little better and more beautiful, and more cunning than anybody's else, is too funny for anything.

A PITTSBURG Justice has handed down the important decision that a man cannot kiss his female typewriter without her consent. It is already known that under social and domestic law he cannot perform this courteous act without his wife's consent, and it seems to be rather poor picking for the men.

QUEEN VICTORIA can knit a stocking, make a pie, snub a Cabinet Minister, brew herb tea, give Albert Edward a wigging, trim a rosebush, make a maid of honor tired and mix her own night-cap just as readily as she can read her own speech the morning after the Lord Chancellor has read it from the throne.

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE is to take a band of warrior monks from France to Africa to engage in a crusade against slavery. They will all go armed, so that the heathen who expects to make a meal off the missionaries, are likey to discover that the new brand is a very unpleasant variety to encounter.

P. T. BARNUM, the great showman, was not only himself a strict abstainer from intoxicating drinks, but he was also a strong advocate of temperance. He used, in the days when the lecturer flourished, to lecture on temperance. He was once in the course of an address interrupted by someone, who shouted out: "How does whisky affect a man, externally or internally?" The quick reply was "Eternally."

SOME writers in one or two of the English papers have been again pointing out the fallacy of the very common idea that melted snow is an ideally pure water. The reverse of this is true. So far from being pure, snow is, practically, a great purifier of the atmosphere from floating particles and noxious gases. These the flakes of snow imprison or absorb as they fall, and, as a matter of course, when the snow melts it is loaded with this rubbish.

IMMENSE swarms of locusts are devastating Northern Africa. Flights of them extend for miles. A stretch of green is perceived by them as soon as it is reached, and down comes the vast swarm to devour even the last blade of grass. It is impossible for them to remain stationary, as the need of food impels them onward from one point to another. From November to the present date they have thus been progressing northward, and at last advices they infested the city of Morocco and all the country round.

The bullets from the revolver whistled close to his head and were buried in the timber. One ball struck an insulator, and the flying glass injured Hughes' face, but otherwise he was not hurt. He called the police, but the would-be assassin could not be found.

Considerable speculation is being indulged in in Fort Dodge railroad circles as to the final outcome of the long pending sale of the Mason City & Ft. Dodge road to the Winona & Southwestern, which is building a line from Winona, ostensibly to Council Bluffs, but in reality to a point not exactly definite in the minds probably even of the company itself. LEARNING TO WALK.

People sometimes ask, at what age can we seat a child in a chair; when put him on his legs; how old must he be before we teach him to walk? The answers are easy. He must not be made to sit till he has spontaneously sat up in his bed and has been able to hold his seat. This sometimes happens in the sixth or seventh month, sometimes later. The sitting position is not without danger, even when he takes it himself; imposed prematurely upon him, it tires the backbone and may interfere with the growth, so the child should never be taught to stand or to walk. That is his affair, not ours. Place him on a carpet in a healthy room or in the open air, and let him play in freedom, roll, try to go ahead on his hands and feet or go backward, which he will do more successfully at first, it all gradually strengthens and hardens him. Some day he will manage to get upon his knees, another day to go forward upon them, and then to raise himself up against the chairs. He thus learns to do all he can, as fast as he can, and no more.

But, they say, he will be longer in learning to walk if he is left to go on his knees or his hands and feet indefinitely. What difference does it make if, exploring the world in this way, he becomes acquainted with things, learns to estimate distances, strengthens his legs and back, prepares himself, in short, to walk better when he gets to walking? The important thing is, not whether he walks now or then; but that he learn to guide himself, to help himself, and to have confidence in himself. I hold, without exaggeration, that education of the character is going on at the same time with training in locomotion, and that the way one learns to walk is not without moral importance.—The Popular Science Monthly.

THE Minnesota legislative committee on expenditures has unearthed a peculiar fraud. It was found that it had costs the state $25,000 the last season for wolf bounties. $5 being allowed for each scalp. Inquiry developed the fact that regular wolf farms existed in the northern counties of the state, where wolves were raised in large numbers simply for the purpose of selling their scalps to the state.

A DOUBLE SUICIDE.

They Suffocated Themselves With Gas While Wrapped in Each Other's Arms.

NEW YORK, April 21.—A young couple registered at the Grand Union hotel Sunday morning as P. Behrand and wife, and were assigned to a large room on the third floor. To-night they were found dead in the room from gas asphyxiation—locked in each other's arms. None about the hotel knew who the couple were, but they were evidently German. He was of light complexion and she was dark. The young man was last seen about the hotel alive yesterday morning, and the fact that there was anything wrong about the room was discovered by the chambermaid reporting that she could not enter it or get any response to her knocking. When the door was burst open it was found that the couple were in bed wrapped in each other's arms. The bed had been pulled out into the center of the room to a place directly under the big chandelier, so as to give a better opportunity for their work. The man was about twenty-five years old and the woman twenty-two.

They left four letters, two to Mrs. Miller, of 210 East Ninth street, one to the coroner and one to a woman in Williamsburgh.

The remains were removed from the hotel to-night with some attempt at secresy, the undertaker removing his name from his wagon. The Mrs. Miller to whom one letter was addressed refuses to state who the suicides are. The letters have not yet been opened.

THREE LIVES THE COST.

CUMBERLAND, Md., April 21.—A bloody tragedy occurred to-day at Oldtown, thirteen miles from here, in which one man was instantly killed and two others mortally wounded.

The murderer is Garrett Luteman, a prominent man, twenty-three years of age, and his victims A. W. W. Carter and William Foley, both equally well known citizens.

Luteman was employed by J. W. Carter, father of one of the victims, in his store as a clerk. He and two men had trouble for several weeks, resulting over money matters. This morning he walked up to William Foley, who was standing in front of Carter's store, and without saying a word, drew a revolver and fired, the bullet lodging in Foley's heart. The latter fell over dead without a word.

Luteman then walked inside the store, where young Carter was engaged in waiting on a customer. Luteman fired at once at Carter, the ball penetrating his lung, fatally wounding him. Luteman's brother, who was standing near by, sprang on him and wrested the revolver from him.

The desperate man wrested himself free from his brother and sprang back of the counter, where he seized another revolver and fired two shots into his own head, then picking up a razor, cut his throat from ear to ear, completely severing the windpipe. When a reporter called on the murderer at his home, he found him still conscious and quite strong, notwithstanding his horrible wounds, and able to converse. He expressed satisfaction over his crime. The physicians say he and one of his victims, Carter, will live but a few hours.

BLOOD FLOWED LIKE WATER.

NEW YORK, 21.—In Hoboken early this morning, Angelo Gaboth, thirty-five years old, of New York, murdered his mother-in-law, dangerously stabbed his father-in-law, and was then killed by Conoquito Chinchella, a son of the murdered woman.

Antonio Chinchella lived in three rooms at No. 195 Grand street, Hoboken. The Chinchellas' daughter and her husband, Angelo Caboth, were visiting the Chinchellas last night. Caboth's wife slept in one room with her mother, and Caboth slept in the second room with his father-in-law.

While all were soundly sleeping, Gaboth arose from his bed and, with a stiletto in his hand, went into his mother-in-law's rooms. Gaboth, with one blow, sunk his stiletto in the abdomen of his mother-in-law, killing her almost instantly.

Gaboth stole back again into the room Chinchella slept, and a moment later he thrust the stiletto into the back of the latter. He meant to end the old man's life with one blow, but he missed the vital spot. As the blow descended Chinchella gave a cry which woke up Conoquito, his son, who was sleeping with his brother in the next room. Conoquito jumped from his bed, looked through the door into his father's room and took in the situation at a glance. He quickly seized his own stiletto and sprang at Gaboth like a tiger.

A fierce contest followed in which Gaboth's wife took part, and was probably fatally wounded, she being stabbed twice and shot three times. Young Chincella finally thrust his stiletto in Gaboth's left eye, reaching the brain, and then piercing his heart with another blow. Young Chincella then gave himself up, and is now locked up at the police station.

A MOUNTAIN TRAGEDY.

Negroes Attacked in a Tanbark Camp and Six Killed.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., April 21.—A report reached here from Rockwood, seventy-six miles from Chattanooga on the Cincinnati Southern road, that twenty-five miles from that place last Sunday a party of native mountaineers rode into a tan bark camp situated on the Cumberland mountains, and, without warning, shot and killed six negroes and wounded ten. The mountaineers, it is said, had been discharged for incompetency, and took this method of vengeance.

Two of the wounded negroes reached Rockwood and took the train for Chattanooga, where they live. The train men report their having boarded the train, but they cannot be found in the city, probably alighting in some of the suburbs. The party who spoke to them states they asserted that the shooting crowd numbered twenty or thirty; and used rifles.

Condemned Men Escape.

EUFALA, Ind. T., April 21.—News has been received here that the execution of Ross Reilly, Jeff Brown, Douglas Brown, Cudge Barnett, Paro Johnson, Lake Andy and Prince Hawkins, in the western portion of the Wewaka district, Creek nation, which was set for to-day, has been frustrated by the escape of the prisoners by the connivance, it is alleged, of their guards. Three of them—Jeff Brown, Hawking and Johnson—were recaptured, but they were the three that it was supposed would be pardoned by the chief. They were taken before the district judge Saturday and their pardons offered them. Those at large are still under sentence of death.

RECALCITRANT.

CHICAGO, April 21.—United States District Attorney Milchrist went before Judge Jenkins in the federal court to-day and made complaint that certain employes of Swift & Co., packers, had refused to answer questions as to discriminations in railroad rates in favor of that firm put to them by the federal grand jury, on the ground that by so doing they might incriminate themselves. Judge Jenkins ruled that they must answer the questions.

The employes of Swift & Co. refused to give the desired information, even after the decision of Judge Jenkins. They are supposed to be acting under the advice of their employers. Their names are F. G. Bowles, I. C. Bartlett, F. R. Briggs and A. R. Fay. An order was issued for these witnesses to show cause, on the first Monday in May, why they should not be attached for contempt of court. It is likely that a special grand jury will be impaneled to continue the investigation and that the officers of the roads, implicated will be called upon to testify.

The roads accused of violating the law in this case are the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, the Lackawanna fast freight line and the Wabash.

LOST HIS WIFE.

The Better Half of a Fargo Brakeman Suddenly Disappears.

FARGO, N. D., Special Telegram, April 21, —Etta Johnson, the wife of W. M. Johnson, a Northern Pacific brakeman, living here, it is alleged, eloped Friday night. She had kissed her husband that morning when he left for his usual two day's trip to Jamestown. When he returned Saturday night he found her gone with all her things. He claimed to have evidence that her companion was a prominent business man residing in Moorhead, who left on the same train. The gentleman was seen to-night and accounted completely for the time during his absence, showing that he could have had nothing to do with the woman's flight.

It is probable the woman had heard of Johnson's doing with other women and has gone to her mother in Dubuque, where they were married a year ago. Her maiden name was Etta Bruce. Johnson was nearly crazy to-night, and was making threats against the supposed seducer. The report is that a former mistress of his sent a letter to the young wife, saying that she had a better right to Johnson than the wife had.

TOBACCO THE TOPIC.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, April 21.—The census office has issued a statement of the acreage and yield of tobacco for the year 1889, showing an increase over the last census of 55,223 acres and 19,052,440 pounds.

The amount produced in Kentucky has increased over 54,000,000 pounds, and there has also been a substantial increase in North Carolina, Tennessee, Ohio, New York and Wisconsin. On the other hand there has been a more or less serious falling off in Virginia, Maryland, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and Missouri.

It is apparent that Minnesota is not a tobacco-producing state. In 1879 there was planted 163 acres, and 69,925 pounds were raised. In 1889 only forty-four acres were planted and 23,285 pounds were raised. Ten years ago there were five acres of tobacco in the Dakotas and 1,897 pounds raised. In 1889 three acres were planted and 785 pounds were raised. There has been about a double increase in Wisconsin, where in 1889 there were 17,251 acres and 19,386,149 pounds produced.

GIBBON RETIRES.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 21.—Brig. Gen. John Gibbon, commanding the division of the Pacific, went upon the retired list at noon to-day.

Two orders were issued from the headquarters of the division. In one of these Gen. Gibbon relinquishes command. In the other Brig. Gen. Thomas H. Ruger assumes command. The latter is not yet in the city, but is within the division limits, and a dispatch was received from him in the morning announcing that he would reach this city via Portland, next Thursday. He is accompanied on his journey by his aide, Capt. Woodruff, of the Fifth infantry.

ANOTHER WAR CLOUD.

England and Portugal Liable to Have a Little Quarrel.

LONDON, April 21.—Advices from South Africa state that the Portuguese, in addition to seizing two British steamers, have seized mails in transit through Mashonaland and expelled the British from the Hengrive river, which is the principal waterway to Mashonland, and have imprisoned a number of British settlers.

A serious rupture between the British and Portuguese authorities is expected. The lives of the British at Heira are in great danger.

LED BY WOMEN.

Strikers Resisting the Officers Who Are Making Evictions.

SCOTTDALE, Pa., April 21.—To-day was prolific of excitement and small riots throughout the coke region. The women generally are leading and most bitter in their attacks on the deputies. During several squabbles to-day a couple deputies were struck with stones, and one was cut on the arm. But few evictions were made, as the sheriffs evidently fear opposition, and are gathering larger forces of deputies.

No More Mobs Wanted.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, April 21. —Secretary Noble is rather anxious to know how the people up around Ashland and vicinity take the order of the department suspending entries of the lands on the Omaha lands. He also wonders who would pay for the people slaughtered by the men who threatened violence unless the entries were allowed to proceed as certain parties thought they should. The secretary is evidently of the opinion that in case any one was killed that the families of the dead men would hold the United States government responsible and proceed to collect indemnity. It is not said that the Italian incident influenced the secretary, but the inference is that no more mobs or killing are wanted, which the government by any possible means can prevent.

Northwestern Postal Affairs.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, April 21. —G. D. Bassett has been appointed postmaster at Seely, Faribault county; O. C. Dill at Bancroft, Kingsbury county, S. D. The name of the postoffice at Rockstad, Polk county, has been changed to Thief River Falls.

A Mail Carrier Arrested.

MINNESOTA SOLONS.

Condensed Proceedings of Both Branches of the Minnesota Legislature.

What is Being Attempted in the Way of Legislation by Our Lawmakers.

Monday, April 13.

SENATE.

Senator Lienau introduced a resolution allowing Edward Newell, file clerk, $3 per day for the first eight days of the session. An amendment offered by Senator Sanborn including G. N. Blaisdell, chief file clerk, was adopted, and the resolution was adopted.

Senator Lommen's resolution providing that the rules of debate in the senate should prevail in committee of the whole was called up by its author, and was promptly killed by the senate.

NO PREFERRED BILLS.

Senator Daugherty moved to reconsider the vote by which Senator Donnelly's resolution to allow each senator to select one bill from general orders, which bills were to take precedence, was defeated. The motion to reconsider was adopted by a vote of 28 to 15, and then the resolution was voted down, receiving 28 votes out of the necessary 36 to adopt.

The senate bill reducing the board of public works of St. Paul from four members to three was returned by the house with an amendment which restored the number to four for one year, after that the board to consist of three members. On motion of Senator Lienau the senate refused to concur in the house amendment, and the bill was sent back to the house.

HOUSE.

Two or three Ramsey county bills were reported back by Mr. Walsh, the secretary of the delegation, among them being H. F. 863, the bill regulating the salaries of St. Paul officials, which was amended so as to increase the fire department appropriation from $205,000 to $215,000. These bills will take their regular order on general orders or the calendar.

On the motion of Mr. T. Cole the chief clerk was instructed to draw his warrant in the sum of $183.88 to defray the expense of the trip of the house committee to inspect the Fergus Falls asylum.

The judiciary committee reported adversely on twenty-two bills and, after their titles had been read, the report was adopted.

The calendar was then taken up and occupied the entire afternoon. Among the bills passed was the Hompe railroad bill, S. F. 699. Mr. Searle moved for a call of the house, but Mr. Currier said there would be no opposition to the passage of the bill, which was then voted upon and passed by a vote of 90 yeas to one nay.

Tuesday April. 14.

SENATE.

The senate spent the greater portion of the day upon the bill relating to the management of the Stillwater prison. An amendment was attached instructing the board of managers to purchase another set of binding twine machinery at once. The number of the managers was reduced from five to three. The perfected bill was passed and sent to the house.

The bill relating to district courts, which passed the senate, provides that the governor shall, whenever in his judgment he thinks it necessary, appoint any district judge in the state to hold court outside of his district. The judiciary committee spent some time in considering the question of redistricting the state into judicial districts, but did not have time to complete a bill for that purpose. In order, however, to equalize the work of the district judges the bill passed was prepared. In some of the districts the judges have, it is said, but little to do, while in others they are overworked.

The forestry bill was indefinitely postponed by the senate. This bill provided for the distribution of printed matter giving directions for cultivating trees and for preserving natural forests. It carried with it an annual appropriations of about $5,000.

HOUSE.

H. F. 1047, the bill giving the city council of St. Paul authority to grant sites to manufacturers on the West side levee, was defeated by a vote of 27 to 21, but on motion of Mr. Bell, who gave notice of reconsideration, the bill was referred to the Ramsey county delegation.

Mr. Hadland's bill, H. F. 586, to prevent towns and villages granting bonuses to railroads unless on a two-thirds vote of the residents, and then the bonus not to exceed 2 per cent of the assessed valuation of the community, was defeated by a vote of 50 to 28.

H. F. 1021, Mr. Keyes' bill prohibiting the contract system at the Stillwater state prison, which had been made a special order, was taken up and considered in committee of the whole, Mr. Maguire of Lac qui Parle being called to the chair.

Mr. Keyes' motion, to recommend the bill to pass, was carried, there being but one dissenting voice heard. The committee then arose and reported, the report being accepted without any negative vote.

On the motion of Mr. Boyd of St. Louis county H. F. 379, the Duluth & Winnipeg land grant bill, was made a special order for this afternoon at 2 o'clock. Mr. Bjorge objected, saying that the bill was nothing but a steal anyway, and that more important bills to the state required consideration.

Mr. Doyle next called up Senator Craig's reaportiontment bill, S. F. 354, and without any discussion or opposition it was recommended to pass.

Wednesday, April. 15.

SENATE

The senate held three sessions yesterday and succeeded in disposing of a good deal of business, and a good start was made towards clearing up general orders.

The question of purchasing newspapers for the senators was brought up again by a resolution, allowing each member 25 cents per day for papers. The principal event of the debate on the resolution was a sparring match between Senators Donnelly and Keller.

Under committee reports the senate labor committee reported back the house bill of Representative Long providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work in all state, county and municipal work, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report of the committee to indefinitely postpone was then adopted by the senate without division.

Two efforts were made to take up the employers' liability bill out of its order, but both failed.

The Keyes election law was labeled to pass; with the amendment off. This amendment could only be the senate amendment requiring the voter to mark the name of each candidate to be voted for.

HOUSE

The principal feature of yesterday's session of the house was the debate on the Duluth & Winnipeg land grant bill. This measure has been hanging over the house since early in the session, and on Tuesday last it was made a special order for yesterday afternoon. The matter came up at 2 o'clock, the speaker calling Mr. Greer to the chair. The debate was long and interesting, and occupied over two hours, the bill being finally recommended to pass by a vote of 56 yeas to 49 nays.

Mr. Bjorge submitted the omnibus appropriation bill which was reported in substance last Saturday. The appropriation for the expenses of the state prison will be embodied in a separate bill.

A motion to suspend the rules and place Senator Leavitt's income tax bill on the calendar was defeated, and the probabilities are it will not be reached this session.

Mr. Bjorge introduced a bill, S. F. 870, calling for an appropriation of $15,000 for legislative expenses in addition to the $150,000 already appropriated. The bill, on Mr. Bjorge's motion, was passed under suspension of the rules.

The speaker announced that the chaplain of the house, the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson, had been bereaved of a daughter, and the members, by a rising vote, expressed their condolence and sympathy.

H. F. 268, Mr. Zelch's free text book bill, providing for a text book commission and uniformity in text books in counties was passed by a vote of 63 ayes and 27 nays.

Mr. Keyes' bill, H. F. 1,021, to abolish the present contract system at the state prison at Stillwater, was passed with only seven dissenting votes. Those voting in the negative were Messrs. Booren, Boyd, Capser, Holler, Lyman, Nilsson and R. A. Walsh.

Thursday, April, 16.

SENATE.

The routine proceedings of the morning session were not of a very exciting character. The Globe Almanac resolution was brought up again and received its third defeat.

The Ramsey county bill providing for the appointment of a gaslight inspector for St. Paul was recalled to the senate.

A petition signed by 3,000 of the leading business men of St. Paul protesting against the passage of the interest bill, S. F. No. 1, was read and filed. Several petitions against the baking powder bill were also received.

Mr. T. Cole, chairman of the committee on legislative expenses made a report to the house recommending that the assistant sergeant-at-arms, three doorkeepers and six gallery and cloak room keepers have their pay increased from $3 per day to $4, and that two pages, Chadwick and Flaherty, be paid $17.50 for sevices rendered. The report was adopted by a vote of 74 to 14.

Unsuccessful efforts were made to advance several bills, among them being H. F. 376, Mr. Bjorge's fixed rate bill, from their lowly position on general orders to the calendar.

HOUSE.

In the senate yesterday morning the first hour was spent in considering resolutions relating to salaries of clerks and other attaches for the senate, the most of the resolutions providing that they should draw pay from the beginning of the session. Only three or four of the resolutions were adopted.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the house bill providing that not more than 33 per cent of the inmates of the state reformatory at St. Cloud shall be employed in dressing granite from the quarries.

Senator Hammer also opposed the bill, while Senator Donnelly favored it. The roll call on the passage of the bill developed 31 votes for and 15 against it.

The joint committee on waterways presented to the senate a voluminous report embodying the result of their researches in the matter of establishing canals in various portions of the state.

Friday April. 17.

SENATE.

The senate spent the first hour of the morning session in considering resolutions, which were interesting mainly to the employes whose per diem was involved in their adoption.

At the afternoon session several bills were taken up from general orders and put upon their passage. Among these was the house anti-Pinkerton bill. Senator Davis opposed the bill on the ground that it was simply a scheme to give the detectives of St. Paul and Minneapolis a monopoly of the detective business in the state and allow them to put in their pockets any rewards that might be obtained for the arrest of criminals.

An amendment offered by Senator Donnelly was adopted, which allows private persons or corporations to employ detectives to hunt down criminals, but does not give them authority to arrest the criminals when found.

The bill as amended was passed by a vote of 30 to 17,

HOUSE.

S. F. 863, the St. Paul city salary bill, was passed by the house as amended by the senate.

Mr. Bell brought up his resolution to cut the Duluth & Winnipeg land grant from ten to five sections per mile, but it was lost by a vote of 63 to 29.

Mr. Maguire introduced a resolution calling attention to the reported cruel treatment of two convicts in the Stillwater penitentiary by Deputy Warden Lemon, and instructing the prison investigating committee of the house to investigate and report by Monday next at 9 a. m. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Capser called up the resolution to pay the telephone clerk $125, and it was passed.

Mr. McAllister's resolution to provide for the printing of 3,000 additional copies of the legislative manual was carried by a vote of 64 to 31.

A resolution to pay for the supply of newspapers to members was passed by a vote of 61 to 38.

The first bill of importance taken up was the Duluth & Winnipeg land grant bill, which, after a brief discussion, was passed

The roll was called and by a unanimous vote of 71 yeas the age of consent bill was passed, and now only lacks the governor's signature to become law.

Saturday, April 18.

SENATE.

The first business done by the senate yesterday morning was to adopt the house joint resolution ordering the printing of 3,000 copies of the manual.

Senator Stevens introduced S. F. No. 834, a bill annexing to the corporate limits of St. Paul twenty-three acres of territory around Lake Phalen, and it was passed under suspension of the rules.

Another bill passed by the senate was Representative Stivers' bill prohibiting railroad companies from working their trainmen more than twenty consecutive hours except in case of casualties.

Among the house bills which passed the senate was the Searle refunding bill, the house bill providing for an investigation of land transfers, the house bills allowing corporations not so empowered, to issue preferred stock, the senate bill increasing the salary of the warden's clerk of the St. Cloud reformatory from $1,000 to $1,200.

HOUSE.

A fierce battle was waged over the general appropriation bill which was finally carried.

H. F. 934, the bill providing for the levying of a state tax of 2.1 mills, which was amended in the senate to 2.2 mills, was finally passed by a vote of 64 yeas to 42 nays, after one of the most unruly half hours spent during the session.

The most important bill passed on the calendar was Senate File 76. Senator Hemp's bill providing for the erection of public grain houses and elevators on the right of way of railway corporations.

A motion to call up McHale's anti-tights bill was promptly squelched.

The house worked away to very little effect all through the hours from midnight until 4 o'clock in the morning and succeeded in passing eight or nine bills, but the confusion was so great that it was im possible to make much progress.

WOMAN'S OWN SPHERE.

SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR FASHION'S VOTARIES.

The Mannerless Woman--A Bright Little Woman--Girls Who are Morbid.

The rich satins, lately so little used, are restored to favor, that their brilliant lustre may enhance the beauty of the gay gowns now worn. Plain satins are used for parts of gowns, for coats of figured dresses, for sleeves of net gowns, and for demi-trains with brocaded coats. But the caprice of the season is for striped satins in narrow serpentine lines, or undulating diagonal waves across the breadth, or the favorite chevron stripes in many zigzag points from selvage to selvage, or else meeting in the middle of the breadth to form a single row of points, Satin and faille alternate in these fancy stripes, and many are of contrasting colors, as lilac and pale blue, buff with blue, tan with green, yellow with white, or rose with green. Tongue-like points of rosy pink satin almost meet in the middle of white faille breadths. Other soft satins have diagonal stripes of three shades of gray, or else of brown shaded to cream-color. Fish-scale designs, shells, and leaf-like points, with their indented edges of silver or gold, are among new brocades, as pink leaves edged with silver, or gray satin leaves with gold. Baskets holding single blossoms or heaped up and overrunning with flowers are favorite designs for satins. The fluttering ribbon and bow-knot designs and the small Pompadour clusters of flowers are all retained.

A novelty is chevron moire stripes on gros grain that is slightly changeable, as gray moire in points on changeable pink and gray silks. The old shade cafe au lait is seen again in new silks. Changeable gros grains of two very light colors are powdered with blossoms, and striped as well. Glace silks have diagonal satin stripes of contrasting colors. Dark silks are intricately patterned with vine stripes crossing diagonally reversed stripes of great width. Black silks have large oval figures of color forming chevron stripss—blue, reseda, rose, or green. Taffetas of light weight for summer gowns are of extremely light colors striped with white and strewn with flowers.

SIMPLE HOUSE DRESSES.

Pretty and simple dresses for the house are made with a pleated coat bodice of light silk—as striped satin surah, wash silks, etc.,—trimmed with metal galloon, and are worn with a wool skirt of contrasting color, widely bordered with a bias band of the silk of the bodice. Thus a striped pink silk waist is worn with a bell skirt of light tan or mushroom wool bordered with the pink silk cut bias and four inches wide. The silk bodice, made over a fitted lining, is gathered on the shoulders in front, and plaited at the waist line, falling thence six or eight inches below; the V space between is of cream guipure or open-patterned embroidery laid flat on pink silk. The back has pleats at shoulders and waist line falling over the middle back form, and there are narrow under-arm forms. The collars, epaulettes, and pointed belt are of mixed silver and gold galloon. The collar is a band of silk with galloon turned over at the top. Mutton-leg sleeves are banded with galloon at the wrist. This can be prettily carried out with a lilac bodice and gray skirt, or green with tan-color, yellow or pink with black, or blue with gray or tan. There are also, for very young ladies and girls in their teens, princess gowns of light or dark wool, made with extreme plainness, and buttoned in the back. Their only trimming is narrow folds of silk edged at the top with gold or silver braid, set around the skirt, forming the high straight collar, and edging the wrist of the mutton-leg sleeves.

The Mannerless Woman.

The young man had just received a letter from her. He was so happy in his thoughts of Her that, he entered the street car, he put his parcel absent-minded at his feet instead of taking it upon his lap properly. It was only a small parcel, but it was heavy. The young man sat quite out of the way, up by the front door, so that, in one whose head was full of other matters, his offense was venial.

The woman boarded the car by the front platform. If she had taken the rear door there would have been no story. Her foot struck the parcel and she tripped slightly. When she had reached a seat her eyes sought out the bundle and then slowly rose, taking in its connection with the young man. She frowned. She spoke. She was a well-dressed woman and her words came fluently. She told the young man that he should have known better than to leave a thing like that on the floor. She might have broken her leg very easily.

The young man blushed. He said nothing. The woman called the conductor. She pointed out the parcel and told him her story. The conductor tried to be properly sympathetic at the thought of some of the bones she did not fracture, but smiled at the packet's inoffensive size. He asked the young man to pick it up, which he did, still blushing, to the manifest discomfort of his knees.

Still the woman glowered and cast wrathful glances. The conductor went to the back platform and talked about the mannerless sex on the man with the sandy mustache who sat on the dashboard and chewed tobacco. Presently the woman started to her feet and made a signal. The conductor stopped the car and held the cord to ring the starting bell. The woman stood still on the platform.

"I tell you," she said, "nobody has any business to be in a horse car with such a great parcel. I might have—"

"Oh, get off." "Start the car," "Let her go, Gallagher," "Finish it to-morrow," yelled the passengers in chorus. They were all mannerless, but the woman had spoiled their breeding. The bell rang, the woman stepped off with a parting shriek, and the conductor wiped his brow with a red bandana.

But the young man with the bundle never said a word. He was not thinking of the woman, but of Her, and furtively reading for the seventh time her letter.—New York Recorder.

A Bright Little Woman.

She was a slight, delicate little woman, with a determined, fear-nothing look on her youthful face. Her jacket was unfastened, her bang tossed back in a careless manner, and altogether there was a brisk, breezy look of the advanced woman about the slim little body. "I've been a business woman for three years," said she, decidedly, "and have invaribly found men in every way courteous and polite to me. The great mistake the independent woman makes in her relations with men is in letting them see that she is independent. Now, when I am with men I am the most helpless, clinging creature on the footstool, and they are always lovely to me.

"Men don't like smart, clever women half so well as gentle, timid creatures that appeal to their sense of chivalry, and the nineteenth century man has as much of it as the mediæval knight if you only know how to find it. Now, when I was first married, and my husband asked me if I was afraid to stay home alone in the evening, I almost laughed, for I really thought nothing at all of going from Staten Island to Yonkers after dinner on business, but I managed to keep my face very serious while I told him I was a perfect coward, that the dreadful shivers ran down my back every time I heard a little noise when I was alone. Result: He stays in every evening, and there isn't a queen on the globe that has as nice a time as I do after the dinner is over. Don't be too smart is my advice to women; or if you can't help being clever and capable, never let the man you love know you are able to pick your own handkerchief up when you drop it, if you want to be treated like a princess royal all your life.—New York Sun.

Girls Who Are Morbid.

I sometimes wish I could have each one of these self-termed unhappy girls for about ten minutes and talk to her, and just make her see that she is a little bit of a dunce. My dear child, when people have trouble, and real trouble, they don't sit down and analyze all their emotions, and remember whether this person or that person looked to the right or to the left when they were speaking to them, or whether due consideration was shown to eyes inclined to brim over with tears and lips over prone to quiver. Before real sorrow I bow myself down with the utmost respect, but before these morbid feelings of yours I am strongly tempted to smile, and yet, after all, I do sympathize with you. But count this morbidness, like a good girl, as a wicked little demon that can be driven out. Healthy companionship, plenty of laughter, good long walks in the sunshine and work will drive out the wicked little imp—discontent—and make you the happy, healthy, hopeful girl that you ought to be. Just form a band against self-analysis, against the inclination to consider what every inflection of the voice and every look of the eye means, and you will be surprised to discover how much of good there is in the world, and how little, comparatively, of that which is bad.—From the Ladies' Home Journal.

Helps to Home Dressmaking.

The fewer seams in a basque the more fashionable it is.

A ruffle of lace below the belt is a pretty finish for an evening bodice.

The high, full sleeves are as popular as ever, and are much longer at the wrist.

Walking-dresses remain short, but those for the carriage wear often lie upon the floor for many inches.

Velvet dresses have been much in vogue this season, being especially adapted to the severely simple styles.

The long postillion back is a favorite, and is trimmed with eight or ten buttons on each side. Buttons may also trim the outer seam of the sleeve from the wrist to the elbow.

Skirts and basques, whether plaid or stripes, are often cut bias; but two or three yards more cloth is necessary to allow for matching perfectly. A plaid badly matched is a monstrosity.

There is a slight inclination toward gored skirts and round waists, since they are usually more becoming to slight forms. Many back draperies are attached to the bodice; this gives the effect of a round waist, and supports the heavy cloth.

A pretty trimming for a skirt is a ruching of the same material, or of ribbon or silk. This requires fully five times as much cloth as the space to be covered; it is laid in triple plaits and stitched in the center. Cloth or silk for this purpose is pinked at the edge.

SECRET REVENGE.

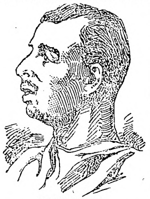
The Mafia the Outgrowth of Kingly Tyranny.

THE TRAGEDY AT NEW ORLEANS.

It Has Brought to the Surface a Number of Strange Statements and Startling Facts—Make-up of the Italian Colony at the Crescent City.

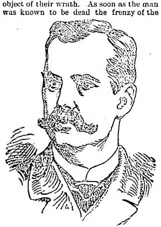
[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

It may be fairly said that never since the world had written history has any tragedy developed such remarkable details and consequences as the recent New Orleans lynchings. To begin with, there was the terrible excitement and intense purpose following the announcement by the jury that they had not convicted any of the Sicilians accused of complicity in the murder of Chief of Police Hennessy.



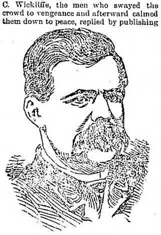
MANUEL POLITEZ.

Then came the wild uproar and deadly work at the parish prison. Even at that supreme moment of blood letting the mob showed some of the strange inconsistencies to which human nature is liable. Manuel Politez, it will be remembered, was one of the two victims who were taken outside the jail and hanged for the edification of the crowd that was unable because of numbers to participate in the sanguinary work done within the walls of the jail. When strung up Politez twice reached above his head, grasped the rope and loosened the noose. A lyncher seized the arms of the desperately struggling man, tied them behind his back and then held the victim by the feet while comrades poured unnumbered bullets into the gasping body of the object of their wrath. As soon as the man was known to be dead the frenzy of the crowd took a new form, and a rush was made by hundreds of people, who stripped the corpse in their desire to possess some fragment of his clothing or of the rope with which he was hanged. It was a strange transition from the rage for revenge to the greed for gain. The struggling men and women wanted the shreds of cloth from Politez's body, not as mementos of the execution, but as talismans that would bring them luck in the lottery or at the gaming table.



W. S. PARKERSON.

This was one of the striking phases of the uprising. Then followed the statement to the world of the reasons therefor, and the world's widely varying comment or criticism. The defenders of the lynchings declared that their work was rendered necessary as a warning to a secret society of Italian assassins known as the Mafia. Prominent Italians responded with the assertion that no such society as the Mafia ever existed. W. S. Parkerson and John C. Wickliffe, the men who swayed the crowd to vengeance and afterward calmed them down to peace, replied by publishing notes received since that fatal Saturday, in which they were warned that the Mafia had marked them for vengeance and that their days were numbered. These documentary statements were backed up by the assertion of Joaquin Manoritta, an Italian priest, who declared that he also had received notice that he was to be assassinated.

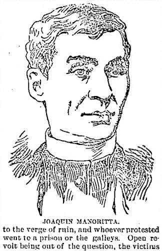


JOHN C. WICKLIFFE.

The Italian consul at New Orleans, the Italian minister to the United States at Washington and the Marquis di Rudini, premier of Italy, denounced the lynchings and demanded redress. All three acted in the heat of indignation following the first intelligence of the tragedy, but blood quickly inflamed soon cools. Certain facts came to light which, while they in no manner extenuated mob law, put a new aspect on the affair. It was shown by the Marquis di Rudini's own record that he not only believed in the existence of the Mafia, but also when acting as representative of the Italian government in Sicily took vigorous measures to exterminate the society, and in accomplishment of what he thought to be his duty ordered the killing of not less than 500 men without the formality of a trial. On the heels of this bit of information came the statement from New Orleans that all the dead men were registered voters of the United States, and that their fate was the concern alone of the American government. The Italian consul also allowed it to become known that there lived in New Orleans between 100 and 200 men, mostly Sicilians, who were wanted in their native land for various crimes, of which murder was the chief. The next sensation followed in the form of an interview with John Rocchi, one of the wealthiest members of the New Orleans Italian colony, and a resident of the city for forty years. He declared that he and all his friends approved the lynching, and that the execution "was a good deliverance to the community." He also asserted his personal knowledge of the existence of the Mafia, who had attempted, under pain of death, to compel him to contribute a thousand dollars to the society. Mr. Rocchi had the nerve to refuse to be blackmailed, and bearding the leaders of the order in their den dared them to kill him. He was not molested.

As for the comments of the press throughout the world, they have been as diverse as personal opinions. But few American papers outside of New Orleans have indorsed the action of the mob, and the Italian journals naturally have denounced it with great bitterness; but the press of other European countries in many cases gave the affair their unqualified approval, and the commendatory utterances of the great London dailies were so emphatic as to be remarkable.

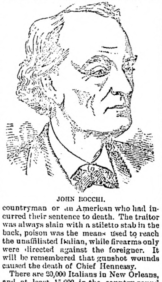
So much for the strange situation of affairs following this fierce tragedy. The lynching itself may be set down as an indirect result of kingly tyranny. Under the rule of the Bourbons, and when Italy was divided into numerous states, oppression ground the people to the earth. The ruling classes taxed the tradesmen and the farmer to the verge of ruin, and whoever protested went to a prison or the galleys. Open revolt being out of the question, the victims of oppression organized in secret, and the result was societies such as the Mafia, the Camorra and the Illuminati.



JOAQUIN MANORITTA.

When Italy achieved freedom and nationality these bodies degenerated from their original purpose, and continued thereafter as bands of blackmailers, brigands and kidnapers. The governments of Victor Emmanuel and of his son, King Humbert, rooted them out by vigorous and bloody methods. What Di Rudini did in Sicily has already been mentioned. Many who escaped the premier's vengeance fled to America and located at New Orleans, where they continued their nefarious practices under new conditions. Although comparatively few in numbers, they terrorized and dominated the respectable and hard working Italian colonists of the Crescent City.

How thoroughly they had refined the art of blood letting is shown by the fact that different weapons were used with which to kill a traitor to the order, an obnoxious countryman or an American who had incurred their sentence to death. The traitor was always slain with a stiletto stab in the back, poison was the means used to reach the unaffiliated Italian, while firearms only were directed against the foreigner. It will be remembered that gunshot wounds caused the death of Chief Hennessy.



JOHN ROCCHI.

There are 20,000 Italians in New Orleans, and at least 15,000 in the country round about the Louisiana metropolis. Those employed on the plantations have superseded the negroes as laborers, and those who live in the city practically monopolize the fruit, oyster and restaurant trades. Nine-tenths of the entire number are frugal, honest and hard working. It is therefore to be regretted, first, that a blot should have been cast upon the good name of the colony by the murder of the chief of police, and, second, that it should have been deemed necessary to avenge that murder by extra legal proceedings.

CEPHAS DE WERDE.

A Warning in a Dream.

A dispatch from Charlotte, N. C., says that the other night Engineer Dillon, of the Danville, Macksville and Southwestern railroad, dreamed that a large rock had fallen on his road near Leatherwood creek, and that his engine, having come in contact with it, was broken to pieces. The dream so impressed him that he declined to make his usual trip over the road in the morning until he had telegraphed to ascertain if there was anything the matter at Leatherwood creek. An answer was returned that verified his vision. The message was flashed back that a huge rock had fallen on the track within a few feet of the identical place dreamed about, and that, although hands had been working for hours to remove it, the track was still obstructed.

A DAY WITH THE MIKADO

The garden party of the emperor is held on or about the 12th of every November in the spacious demesnes of one of the royal palaces at Asakusa. It is the festival of the chrysanthemum, which brings with it so happy an innovation, for at this time of year the flower par excellence of Japan, the national Kiku, is everywhere in glowing and glorious bloom, and the ostensible reason for the gathering in the Asakusa Palace gardens is therefore to view the innumerable and splendid specimens of this special plant of Nippon which the skillful gardeners of the court have reared during the year past.

Everywhere are chrysanthemum shows and chrysanthemum parties, and while private gardens are embellished with choice displays in all sorts of colors the hillsides and lanes are also full of the more modest and quiet wild blooms of the same imperial plant, which grows everywhere, and is everywhere, even in the simplest specimens, bright and pretty.

Of course the imperial gardeners showed samples of the Kiku which were well worth the study and admiration of all florists and botanists if attention could have been devoted to them. There is nothing to be seen at your Temple Gardens or at any other center of the cultivation of the "golden bloom" in England to compare with the really marvelous developments of the Kiku under Japanese hands.

CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

Ranging through an endless number of colors, and displaying all forms and fashions of structure, the beautiful plant shows in one place a cluster of close and compact stars of varying hues, in all the tones and tints of white, yellow, russet, amber, purple and cream, and in another fantastic and disheveled yet wildly symmetrical blooms, the petals flung abroad from the corolla in beautiful profusion of scattered loveliness and glory, some as if of shot silk or satin, some revealing a sober lining splendidly contrasted with the brilliant upper surface, some in tangled delicacies of one and the same rich tint.

We are grouped all together, with our backs to the beauties of the parterre, in a mass of some 500 or 600 people who have been honored with the great square cards of invitation to this high function. The royal card, printed in gold, enjoins all alike to wear frock coats ("frokko cotto") and silk hats, and thus we all look more or less alike—diplomats, generals, naval officers, minstrels and private persons—diversified only by the Corean officials in long robes of white and Puritan hats with amber strings and the ever graceful costume of some Japanese ladies present who have proved faithful—even against court fashion—to kimono and obi. The throng suddenly falls to "Attention," for the strains of the national anthem of Dai Nippon sounds from the gayly garbed band. "The Emperor is Coming."

HIS MAJESTY WALKS.

His imperial majesty comes first and all alone. I have often seen him, and always find the same difficulty in analyzing my own impressions, or conveying them, as to that impassive, reserved, changeless, dark, far removed countenance. I have seen it all day long in the smoke of the mimic battles at Nagoya, and all night long in the festal halls at the Shiro, and at receptions and court ceremonies; but I never witnessed the slightest alteration of its fixed immobile features.

Only a flatterer could call the proud, cold face handsome, and only an enemy or a soshi would, I think, style its austere constraint and lofty discontent ill looking. One would say this is a mikado of the past, who is obliged to belong to and to bow before the too prevailing present, but who nevertheless keeps his secret soul apart in the stern and great society of his ancestors, and "with the far off company of antique Shinto gods."

He walks between us alone, his arm too sacred, too separate, to be taken in public even by the empress, who comes behind, a small, exquisitely graceful lady dressed in a mauve satin toilet of Parisian style, and mauve bonnet, with parasol to match, all borne with the utmost charm and becomingness; behind her imperial majesty, also passing singly, a bevy of ladies of the court, all but one in European dress, and following the ladies the gentlemen of the palace in black frock coats and tall hats.

THE MIKADO'S COSTUME.

His majesty wears the undress uniform of a general—cherry colored trousers and black frogged coat braided with gold lace, and on the small, close cut brows a kepi of scarlet with gold band. His bow in recognition of all our bare and bended heads is the slightest possible inclination which rigid muscles can make, yet withal accompanied by a glance kindly, benign and full of evident good will, for his lips almost smile, his eyes are alert and lighted, his air is, one might almost dare to say, genial, and these nods of the Japanese Jove must be measured by loyalty with a micrometer.

Moreover, when we pass into the refreshment tent and the emperor and empress take their seats the etiquette observed around is by no means stiff. We may approach the royal table and speak with friends there sitting close to the majesty of Japan. Nay, when champagne has been quaffed and mayonnaise of lobster or chicken tasted, the emperor endures very humanly to have personage after personage presented to him, and addresses to some of them—to the writer of these notes among many that were more worthy—some gracious and friendly words in the soft Japanese, which he always speaks. The ladies of the court and the gentlemen mingle meanwhile with the throng and chat, sans ceremonie, with friends.

The royal pair depart as they came, the empress following the emperor, the plaintive strains of the national hymn again being heard, and we saunter out of the gardens.—Edwin Arnold in London Telegraph.

Beautiful California Shells.

The shell of the greatest benefit to California is the abalone or Haliotis, several beautiful species of which are found at the islands of San Clemente and Santa Catalina. When polished the shells present a rich and beautiful luster; some red, others black, with intermediate tints of great beauty. Hundreds of abalones are sold as curiosities, but the largest number go east, some to be sent to Germany to be made into various objects which are shipped back to America. One might ask why this work cannot be made on this coast. California has shipped 7,000 sacks a year, and possibly more, bringing to the state from $50,000 to $60,000. About 196 different kinds or specimens are known in various waters.—San Francisco Chronicle.

THE PREMIERE DANSEUSE.

It Requires Hard Work for Eight or Ten Years to Reach Her Rank.

It is not the work of a year or two years, but of eight or ten, to make a premiere danseuse. The agility that a first class dancer displays upon the stage and that strength of bone and muscle necessary to enable her to go through her evolutions, to pirouette on her toes and bend her body into the curve of an arch, are the result of years of earnest work and constant practice.

"In my own case," said Mlle. Adele Cornalba to a reporter, "I have been a student of my art from the age of seven years. I was sent by my parents to the celebrated dancing academy at the La Scala, Milan, and have ever since applied myself assiduously to my studies. At this academy there are four classes, graded according to the age and physique of the pupils. For instance, the youngest beginners are put into the first class and one hour a day is given to practice. Their strength will not stand more. The second class pupils are required to work two hours a day, the third class from two to three, and the fourth class three as regularly as the sun rises.

"It is impossible for any girl to become a good premiere before the age of sixteen or seventeen years. She has not the natural strength to stand the strain upon her system. The labor is difficult and severe because it requires such constant application. A dancer must not neglect her practice, because, if she does, she is sure to get heavy and stiff. No one can become a pupil at the Italian dancing academy unless she can pass a thorough medical examination, and every year that she continues as a pupil she must submit to this inspection. When some physical defect manifests itself the pupil is at once dropped from the list. A dancer must be the possessor of a sound constitution, because her life is one of constant exercise.

"Her work may appear easy to the public after she has reached the height of her ambition, but even if the people forget the trials and exertion necessary before she can reach that position they cannot realize how earnestly she must work after she has attained success. Every bone must be strong and kept strong, and every muscle must be trained to its best development. And this training is not confined to any part of her body. A first class dancer is able to stand upon her toes without shoes upon her feet. Of course all the practice is done in shoes, but by and by the bones and muscles of the feet become so strong and firm that without any difficulty she can stand upon her toes without any support. But I have to practice all the time to keep myself in the proper condition. I cannot say that one particular build of woman is better adapted to the terpsichorean art than another, but health is required in every one. As a general rule thin women never look well on the stage.

"But the slender women always make the best dancers. It is impossible for a danseuse to become stout, because her labors always keep down the accumulation of avoirdupois. Especially is this true in the United States, where the managers require a premiere to dance every night and at two matinees. It is also very important for a premiere to be careful about her feet. She must eat more meat than anything else to keep her muscles in the best condition, and she must have plenty of sleep and rest. The labor is so hard that after every performance I feel it necessary to sleep at least two hours.

"Where do the best dancers come from? Well, I do not want to seem prejudiced in behalf of my own country, but I am forced to declare that they come from Italy. The methods there are more thorough, and dancing is made more of an art than in any other country. The American dancers I find to be very intelligent, and nearly all have good figures. But the Italians have the school and the constancy to master their art, and that counts for everything in the pursuit after success."—Chicago Post.

Paying to See Himself Perform.

The following amusing incident happened to Mr. J. W. Turner, proprietor of the Turner Opera company, while at the Grand Theatre, Birmingham. Being rather late arriving at the theater one evening he proceeded to the front entrance to save time in going round to the stage door. As he was passing the ticket office he was pulled up rather sharply by the collector with:

"Where's your ticket?"

"I haven't got one," was the meek reply; "I'm Mr. J. W. Turner."

"You don't say so?" was the sarcastic rejoinder. "I've had your sort here before; but you're not coming in without a ticket."

All his efforts to prove his identity were fruitless, so, seeing that further argument was useless, he was on the point of paying for admission when he was instantly recognized by one of the officials, who, taking in the situation at a glance, came and explained matters to the thunderstruck ticket collector, who was profuse with apologies. Mr. Turner laughed heartily at the idea of paying to see himself perform.—London Tit-Bits.

Derivation of Two Flowers' Names.

A tuberose is not a rose, although the majority of English speaking people say it is, because they give the word only two syllables—tube-rose. The tuber-ose is the Polyanthes tuberosa, a flowering, bulbous plant, belonging to the East Indies. It has knots, or tubers, connected into a bunch, as in the potato.

Nor has our dandelion any connection with a fop or a lion. To call a dandelion akin in any way to the fop is as pertinent as the translation certain English gardeners give to the well known rose—the rose des quatre saisons—the rose of the four seasons, which they call the "Rose of the Quarter Sessions," as though it had some connection with the bench and the bar and the administration of justice. The word dandelion is from the French dent de lion, the lion's tooth, and in Greek the flower is the leontoden, also lion's tooth, from the shape of its petals, which are fancied to be like the teeth of lions.—Harper's Young People.

Two Relatives.

An absent minded woman in this town started down street the other day and slipped and fell flat. In recovering herself she got turned around and started back home. She is a cousin to a woman who started to prepared the evening meal recently, when she sneezed, and upon recovering, thought she was "doing up" the supper dishes. She put everything away nicely and sat down for a quiet evening.—Fairfield (Me.) Journal.

Little Sister (loftily)—No; I don't allow all the gentlemen to kiss me as sister does. There's a great difference in people, you know.—West Shore.

Vol. VIII No. 18. RED LAKE FALLS, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, APRIL 30, 1891. TERMS, $1.50 PER YEA

To whom it may concern:

ST. PAUL, Minn., March 2d, 1891.

The painting season is near at hand, and everyone has a House, Barn, Floor, Buggy, or some article of Household Furniture that either requires a coat or two of paint, or else would be beautified by it.

The use of paint is economy in the truest sense of the word.

Now, painting, like any other business proposition, resolves itself in a great measure, into a question of dollars and cents.

Ready-mixed paints are yearly gaining in favor, excepting in places where inferior and worthless articles have been sold and used but it should be borne in mind that these goods are not all alike, for good mixed paints are made. Special machinery, pure ingredients, and many years of experience will produce a better paint than can be made hand-mixed, by any one.

We justly claim to manufacture a grade of ready-mixed paints, of a very high standard. Combining the purest of materials by the use of the latest improved machinery, and skilled workmen, we offer to the public, through our agents, an article that cannot but prove absolutely satisfactory to the consumer in point of durability and fine finish. It requires no skill to apply them, merely ordinary care and intelligence.

The first cost of a paint is a minor consideration; a cheap mixture will not possess more than about two-thirds the covering qualities of a good one, and the fact of its being adulterated to that degree is conclusive proof that it cannot withstand the action of the elements upon it. Do not be misled by offers made you of a paint at a price which is often as low as a manufacturer can afford to sell a reliable article at wholesole. Competition is now so keen in every branch of business that excessive profits are no longer possible; therefore bear in mind that the merchant selling at a seemingly low figure, is undoubtedly making as much profit as the one handling a good Paint, and that the difference in price is represented by the difference in quality.

Marvelous Wealth.

The Unsettled Country North of Red Lake—What the Duluth & Winnipeg

Will Open up—Mineral, Iron, Gold and Coal Waiting For Miner's Pick.

A Two-months' Journey on Foot Through Snow and Watery Fields.

Jas. C. O'Brien returned Monday from a trip through that almost unexplored region north of Red Lake. The party consisting of ten under command of J. W. Howes, deputy U. S. marshal were sent out by the Indian department to investigate the alleged encroachment of whites upon the northern part of the reservation. They left Red Lake agency about two months ago about the time when the season was coldest and snow deepest. They secured Indians as guides and had two dog trains with which to convey their supplies. The journey at first was made upon snow shoes, later when the snow had melted they were obliged to wade through water for miles at a time Mr. O'Brien reports some very fine farming country along the rivers tributary to the Lake of the Woods. The supposed swampy portion north of Red Lake is not so extensive as reported. The line of the Duluth & Winnipeg R. R. runs through some very fine agricultural country. The rivers of this section are the most magnificent beheld by human eye, the waters all teeming with fish and fur bearing animals. Upon the Rainy Lake River and at the outlet of Rapid river are beautiful townsites. What will add most to the wealth of the country is the pine and mineral. Many of the half breeds and others who have squatted upon the reservation report iron, copper and gold among the minerals while coal floats down the rivers after heavy rains or during times of floods. The fish industry is important along the Lake of the Woods and tributaries. One individual has built upon the reservation a large ice house where fish are packed. Sturgeon eggs are preserved and shipped to Europe. The inhabitants as a class are lawless and greatly addicted to the use of alcohol and tobacco. Money is a scarce article and change or small denominations is at a premium. A vast amount of timber has in past years been stolen from the reservation and run into Canada; along the Roseau river, a tributary of the Red river, is a vast tract of pine which will come into market in a short time. This will be a good investment for some American capitalist as the lumbermen from Winnipeg rely on securing a supply of logs from this tract. An exhaustive report of the expedition will no doubt throw a great deal of information to the department of the country north of Red Lake. The Duluth & Winnipeg railroad will open up a wonderful country and there will be a chance for the accumulation of fortunes along this line.

The County.

St. Hilaire Lutherans are contemplating the erection of a church edifice there in the fall.

St. Hilaire has no vacant houses. They have all been moved to Thief River Falls.

The Thirteen Towns says that never since the Thirteen Towns was thrown open to market has there been such a large demand for farming lands as this spring, nearly every day sees a number of transfers, and land is rapidly increasing in value. There is every evidence that the period of depression that has existed for the past few years in farm lands has raised, and that they will soon again reach their proper value. If another good crop is secured this year, and there is now every evidence that there will, land that has been sold this spring could not be bought again for twice what was paid for it. We know of no better investment, and none that will yield larger returns, than the buying of farm lands in this vicinity, at the present current prices.

A Woman Journalist.

Some years ago there walked up the stairs leading to the office of the Engineering and Mining Journal, an influential technical and trade paper in New York, a young woman looking for a typewriter's and stenographer's position. She was rather dismayed by desks piled high with dusty books and papers, and withdrew her application. The next day came another, a slip of a girl with brown eyes and excessively quiet ways, who must have seemed particularly out of place among the learned "M. E.'s" and "C. E.'s" who write articles about the lixiviation of silver ores with hyposulphite solutions and the world's visible supply of copper. She persevered, not only as secretary to Editor Rothwell, but spent her leisure studying the exchange bundle and culling scraps of mining news until little by little the whole mining news department, with the task of editing the original matter, toning down the extravagant reports of correspondents enthuiastic over bonanzas, and making the Journal felt among miners as a store house of reliable facts among their business, fell into her efficient hands. She developed at the same time a gift for managment, was put in responsible charge of the office and the staff employed in it, became treasurer of the Scientific Publishing Company which gets out the Journal, and a little more than a year ago became business manager.

She keeps three or four typewriters busy, attending to all business correspondence, makes payments and receives them, superintends the advertising solicitors and make up from thirty to sixty pages of advertisment weekly. She has visited nearly every mine of any consequence in the country and knows its condition and prospects from personal observation. From a tour through the West last summer she bought home interesting experiences and added to her collection of mineralogical specimens and Pueblo pottery.

She is Mrs. Sophia Braeunlich, and the big office of the Journal is said to be, under her managment, the best ordered in New York.—Washington Post.

A Wife's Grievance.

Mrs. Treffle Daoust, Known Also as Mrs. Mary Lecours, Thinks She Has

Been Abused—She Writes a Letter—She Claims Her Husband is "A Brute" and "Lies Audaciously"—Other Matters of Less Import.

Last week, Treffle Daoust published an article in the Red Lake Falls Gazette, advertising to everybody, but particularly the merchants of Red Lake Falls, that I, his wife, Mary Lecours, had left his bed and board, and that he would not pay any debts contracted by me, though almost every one who is acquainted with me knows that it is not me that has left my home but that it was my husband who put me out of doors. I wish to let those who have read that article and do not know me, know that so saying my husband lied audaciously to the public. I will explain the circumstances and you may judge for yourselves: In November last, one of my daughters and son-in-law, who were going to Canada to visit the country, proposed to take me with them on condition that they would pay all my expenses. Tempted to see my mother, whom I had not met for nine years, I accepted and we started. My husband, who for a long time had wanted to rid himself of me, did not miss the occasion to publish everywhere that I had left him forever. I will not repeat all the foul things he said about me; the very idea makes me blush. I will only say that he promised himself that I should not enter the house upon my return. I had learned all that, but though I knew my husband was a brute, I doubted the truth of the rumor. But I was obliged to believe it when I arrived home and found a family in my house, protesting that they had rented the house for one year—which could not be true because I arrived on the 18th of February and on the 14th of March my husband went to the town clerk's to have leasing papers made for his house and farm. When I asked him why he had rented the house he told me that I had gone permanently—and that was why he rented it! But I said "You are telling a falsehood. I did not tell you that I would not come back." He said "I do not care much for this house; I will leave the country this spring." "And you thought I should stay in the road" I replied. "If you were respectable enough to live with Mrs. So-and-so you could stay here, but she says she cannot suffer you." said he. "Alright sir, I will not bother you any more, neither Mrs.———. When I do come back here the house will be vacant." "You can stay in the shanty," he rejoined. (The shanty is a small cabin for his dogs. "Keep it for yourself," said I and I started. Now do you believe that a man that acts like that can tell that his wife has left his bed and board? Unnecessary to say; no, everyone will understand it. Concluding, let me tell you, dear readers, that living with my husband I did not indebt him, and I do not intend to indebt him now; and I wish for the merchants of Red Lake Falls that they lose no more money with anybody else than they will with me.

THE WORLD.

The heart of the world is weary,
Sad heart of the worn, old world;
Her days are dark and dreary,
Her banners of joy are furled.

Oh, world! It is so marvel
That you grow tired of days,
With sin and sorrow lurking
In all your crowded ways:

The solitary star, the only,
Where death and evil come in;
In your place so dark and lonely,
Bearing your weight of sin;

Bearing your burden of sorrow,
Your hope that is but a pain,
That each recurring tomorrow
Renews but to mock again.

Oh, world, that all one half is gloom,
And half in sun is swinging!
Would we had seen thy radiant bloom,
When morning stars were singing;

When fresh and dewy from God's hand,
The angels learned to love you;
And heaven itself, with all its peace,
Was not so far above you.

Alas! the skies are higher grown,
The angels come not near you.
Oh, world, so weary with your sins,
No wonder that they fear you!

LUELLING.

A NIGHT AMONG WOLVES.

When a settlement was first made in South Kentucky, one of the great dangers of the colony was the universal presence of the wolf among those prairies and woods. The large, grey, gaunt brute inhabited every solitude of the plains, every recess of the mountain. Around the "Green River" lay heavy forests, into which no one ventured to go unless armed with a gun, and ready to meet the savage animal at every turn. Still, as the soil was fruitful, and the climate pleasant, heathy, and equal, the country rich in productions, and every reward offered to industry, no one cared for these perils, and a settlement rose and prospered in that shady wilderness. Farms were scattered over the plain, and the barnyards were robbed of calves and pigs; belated wayfarers were attacked, and sometimes even a child was carried away.

Gradually there was a population in South Kentucky. There was a town here and there, and there were many plantations, especially a little way below the mouth of the Green River, which pours its waters into the "rolling Ohio." Henderson was one of the most prosperous of these, but it was grievously haunted by wolves.

Henderson took its name—which extended to a whole county—from a family of wealthy planters located there. Now they had an old black slave called Dick, who was a skillful fiddler, but good for litte else. Nothing did he know, and nothing did he like, but the art of charming music from an old violin. Yet he was an important man—the most important "gemman of colour" in all that country. Nothing, for forty miles around, could go on without his presence. Who could dance in the Juba ring; who could fly round in the festal circle on "cornshocking day;" who could bless the merry nuptials of the slaves; who could trip to the moon at "breakdown" feasts, unless Dick the fiddler were there? None of these things could be enacted without him; so he was in continual request. His master was wealthy and good-natured, and allowed him to have very much his own way. He called him, indeed, a "necessary nuisance," because he kept the blacks in good humor by the magic of his old violin.

It is said that all fiddlers have two characteristics—punctiliousness and punctuality. These, in the case of Black Dick, filled up, as it were, a sort of supplemental moral code. He would indulge you on other points, but unless you kept your appointment, and unless you behaved with propriety, Dick was not only severe, but implacable. It happened once that a grand marriage festival took place among the "colored people" at a plantation about six miles from Henderson. Old Dick, of course, was summoned to act as musician and master of the ceremonies. He dressed himself. He put on his blue coat, with its long tails and flaming gilt buttons. He rolled a brilliant cravat round an immensely high shirt-collar, starched as stiff as Dinah could starch it. He allowed the younger niggers to leave before him, because, though he liked punctuality, he would never demean himself by unbecoming haste, and, when ready,—fiddle under his arm,—he sallied forth alone.

It had been a severe winter. The cold bright stars were burning deeply in the clear sky. The snow was crisp, and crackled under his feet. His way lay, for the most part, along a narrow path through a forest, where there was not a waggon-road for miles, and where at intervals a broad glade opened to the eye, half full of light from the moon, half full of shadows from the trees. It was a silent and dismal solitude—such a solitude that the very silence seemed full of echoes, the very loneliness full of beings. But Dick went on regarding nothing but the visions that played before his eyes, of a warm, cheering room, crowded with happy people, of every face beaming with satisfaction as he appeared, of homage yielded to him by old and young, of universal allegiance to his sway, as the victory of King Etiquette. Still dignity and all things considered, he could not but hasten his steps. Perhaps he had lingered too long over the polishing of those brass buttons. Perhaps the setting and trimming of that splendid collar had delayed him beyond his time. Perhaps, too he was anxious to get as quickly as possible out of the wood. And well he might wish as quickly as possible to get out of the wood. There was a route of wolves at a distance on every side. They were yelling behind him; the dismal howl was echoed far in front; and right and left they were rushing with uncouth clamour through the fosest in pursuit of their prey. Gradually the sounds came nearer. They seemed to be closing round him. He hurried as he heard them amid the crackling bushes. He began to run. He heard them tearing the faster for his running. He leaped forward mad with horror, for the wood seemed alive with devils, and a pack of hungry wolves appeared charging upon him from every side.

But he soon stopped running. He knew the nature of the wolf; it is very cautious of attacking a human being, and never does so without following him first for a considerable time. If you walk steadily, without seeming afraid, it is still more hesitating. This the old fiddler understood. He kept on a regular pace, afraid to run, lest the whole rout should be on him at once. But the danger continued to increase. Every moment Dick shuddered as a black form rushed by, and he expected to be seized, for as each brute approached him he heard its jaws snapping with a ring like that of a steel trap. The pack was evidently gathering. But he knew that a little way on there was an old clearing with a deserted hut in the middle, and this he hoped to reach before the wolves began their attack.

They were, however, becoming each instant more audacious. He could see their wide green eyes sparkling through the thickets around. At length some of them swept by close to his legs, snapping at him as they passed. He struck out with his fiddle. The strings jarred loudly, and, oh! what a relief came to his shivering soul when he perceived that the sound made the brutes stand off. He immediately struck his hand violently across the chords. A wolf that was within two yards of him leaped aside in terror. He smote his violin vehemently again and again, and so proceeded, walking rapidly forward, raising that strange music in the woods to terrify the creatures that beset him.

Soon he reached the clearing. It was a broad space, covered with snow, which shone like a pavement of pearl in the watery light of the moon. All around the clear sky appeared like a silver trellis through the lace-like branches of the trees; and in the centre of the field stood an object, which Dick at once recognized to be the hut of which he was in search. He bounded hastily upon the white surface, scraping the strings with his hand until they shrieked harshly; and the wolves roared again with horror. They paused at the edge of the clearing, with tails between their legs, looking after the singular being, whom they desired, but feared to attack. It was but for a moment, however. The savage instinct was instantly renewed, and again they gave chase, yelling along, their black shadows hurrying like phantoms oyer the snow. Still Dick continued striking his fiddle; but even this would not have saved him had he not reached the hut just as the whole pack was at his heels. In he rushed, slammed the ricketty door, clambered up a beam, emerged through a hole upon the roof, and there remained, perched on the gable, with the frail tenement literally shaking beneath his weight. Lucky it was for him that he had secured his position. The door of the cabin did not for a moment withstand the attack of the wolves who clambered against it, and immediately thronged the interior. They were now wild with rage. They leaped up, they gnashed their teeth, they closed their jaws with that sharp snap so horrible to the ears of the fiddler, and he almost fell from his roost in despair; but he remembered the effect of his violin. He had not yet drawn the bow from its case, but now did so, and struck it shrieking across the strings, forced all the while to keep his legs kicking high in the air to avoid the trap like fangs that were only a few inches below. In an instant the yells ceased, and the nigger went on, drawing forth the most wild, hysterical grating sounds from his friendly violin.

It was singular to observe, however, that this barbarous noise had no other effect upon the creatures than to astonish them. Even wolves cannot be charmed with bad music. When the first surprise was over they renewed their attack. Presently a great gaunt head lit by two eyes like globes of green fire, was thrust up through the roof!

"Who's dar?" shrieked the negro, mad with horror. An instinct saved him. Just as there seemed no thread of fate to hold him from being dragged down and made the prey of these ravenous brutes, he once more smote his bow upon the fiddle, and began playing with desperate energy "Yankee Doodle." The loud, animating, inspiring notes, caused instantaneous silence among the hungry route below. Orpheous piping to the brute was no unmeaning fable. Dick won a kindred triumph. With astonishment he saw the result of his music. Around him was the most attentive audience that ever listened to his fiddling. But whenever there was the slightest pause the wolves sprang forward and commenced their howl again. Thus the black was forced to labor away, flinging his feet into the air, redoubling his vigour, and filling the whole clearing with this extraordinarw harmony. A feeling of professional pride gradually stole over him in spite of his alarm. Now and then a thought of the wedding, of the warm lights, of the sweetened whiskey, of the whirling dance, of the homage and admiration of the colored people, came regretful into his mind; but he knew that he was safe so long as he continued to play; so on he went, from "Yankee Doodle" to "Hail Columbia," searching his memory for every lively strain, to charm away the ferocity of the strange auditors that crouched around.

But pleasure, and pride, as well as patience, came to an end. It was a cold night; Dick had walked far and fasted long; his arms were weary of exercise; he began to feel benumbed, hungry, and exhausted. Nothing, however, could be done but play on, for at every pause those fearful growls began again. There was no contenting that shaggy troop of connoisseurs, fidgeting as they sat, with lolling tongues and perched ears, through several hours of the wildest night that Dick had ever known. The moon went down low in the sky. A deeper shadow crept from under the arches of the forest. The stars seemed more pale, the forms of the trees more bare and gaunt, and the troop of wolves to multiply instead of diminishing.

At last, however, the negroes at the wedding feast became alarmed. They knew that of all the colored people Dick was the very minute-hand of punctuality; when he failed, it was invariably because something or somebody had failed him. Now, therefore, that he was hours beyond his time, a serious accident must have occurred. They were all as much concerned by this fear as by the dread of losing the pleasurable excitement of a dance. So they took lanterns and staves; and went out through the plantations to look for him; and when they found him, he was still perched on the roof of the old hut, sawing upon his fiddle, running over all his tunes again, but ready to drop with weariness and cold. The wolves were driven off, and they reluctantly quitted the spot. Their forms might be seen lingering on the skirts of the wood; and as the negroes passed on with their old friend, a howl, rising at intervals, and an occasional rustling among the bushes, showed that the pack was still in wary and determined, but useless pursuit.

It was long past midnight when Dick arrived with his fiddle. There was no help for it, however. All that could be done was to go on all next day instead of breaking up in the morning. The doors were wide with welcome. The fires blazed high, and their light danced in ruddy streams over the floor. The corn-cakes were hot and the whiskey was abundant, so Dick was cheered after his adventure; and for many, many hours he went on playing to a happy crowd of revellers those airs of merriness which to save his life, he had been playing all night to a pack of wolves.

A Snake Story From India.

There is a belief current in all parts of India that a certain variety of snake called Shesh Nag, when it attains the age of 1,000 years, has a precious jewel formed in its head. This jewel, it is affirmed, possesses the quality of sucking up the poison of the deadliest snake, if applied to the wounded part. Strangely enough, a Paris gentleman is reputed to possess this invaluable jewel, according to a correspondent of a Gujarati weekly, published at Wadhwan, in Gujarati. The correspondent says that when the present owner—who, by the way, is now sixty-three—was twenty-three years old, he lighted upon a snake of the above mentioned variety, which he killed. Then he found the jewel in his head. It has already saved several lives.

"Last year, when Mr. Vidal, the collector of the district, was there, it was shown to him too. The jewel is said to contain a thin, cresent-like fibre, which unceasingly oscilliates in the center. The gaikwar of Baroda, the maharajah of Kolhapur, and several of her native princes are said to have offered several hundred thousand rupees for this unique jewel. The name of the owner is Mr. Framji Dadabbia Govekar, Tarspur, Bombay presidency. There is another belief prevalent in India that if a man be sleeping, no matter where, and a Shesh Nag come and sit beside him, with a hood spread over the sleeper's face, the latter is sure to be a son of fortune. Popular tradition assigns the same reason to the rise of Haida Ali, of Mysore, from a common soldier.

Women In Business.

And now comes testimony from Harvard college to the effect that "the girls in the school are sharper and more critical than the boys." It is too late in the century for a statement of that kind to cause any surprise. That woman's perceptions are fully as keen, her mental qualities as great, her capacity for acquiring knowledge, and the facility with which she can use it in every respect fully equal to man's, has been proved in thousands of instances. Whether or not she has the mental endurance remains for the next generation to determine, as not enough time has elapsed as yet, nor will for the next decade or two, to determine that point.

Women are fast pushing themselves to the front in most of the vocations of business and professional life, and that they succeed in maintaining their foothold depends surely, on more than the mere fact that they work for less wages, often than men. Then there is found in them, as a class, that best of ability—reliability. This is doubtless due to regular habits, the absence of night rushing, the use of liquor, tobacco and dissipation. On this account their chances for continued success and favor in their lines of employment average considerably better than with the masculine element. As it is, with less wages, the female worker is known in investment and saving circles to lead her brothers in accumulating money.—Chicago Globe.

But the Baby Was a Girl.

Mark Twain, in his talk at Bryn Mawr college, where he has a daughter, told of a minister who took advantage of a christening to display his oratorical powers. Taking the infant in his arms, the preacher said to the audience: "He is a little fellow, yes, a little fellow, and as I look in your faces' I see an expression of scorn which suggests that you despise him. But if you had the soul of a poet or the gift of prophecy you would not despise him. You would look far into the future and see what might be. So this little child may be a great poet and write tragedies, or perhaps a great warrior wading in blood to his neck he may be—er—what is his name?—his name, oh, is Mary Ann!"

A DREAM.

There are times when a dream delicious
Steals into a musing hour,
Like a face with love capricious
That peeps from a wooland bower;
And one dear scene comes changeless,
A wooded hill and a river;
A deep cool bend where the lilies end
And the elm tree shadows quiver.

And I lie on the brink there dreaming
That the life I live is a dream,
That the real is but the seeming,
And the true is the sun-flecked stream.
Beneath me the perch and the beaver sail by
In the dim cool depths of the river;
The struggling fly breaks the mirrored sky,
And the elm tree shadows quiver.

There are voices of children away on the hill;
There are bees thro' the fag flowers humming;
The lighterman calls to the clock, and the mill
On the farther side is drumming.
And I sink to sleep in my dream of a dream,
In the grass by the brink of the river,
Where the voices blend and the lilies end
And the elm tree shadows quiver.

Like a gift from the past is the kindly dream,
For the sorrow and passion and pain
Are adrift like the leaves on the breast of the stream,
And the child life comes again.
O the sweet, sweet pain of a joy that died!
Of a pain that is joy forever!
O the life that died in the stormy tide
That was once my sun-flecked river.

STORIES OF WILLS.

There was an old lady, a toothless old dowager, who had a reprobate and discarded son, and a pretty, gentle niece, who lived with her. We used to manage all her affairs, and it was pretty well-known in the office that the "nice girl with the long curls" was to be the old lady's heir. Our head-clerk, a red-whiskered dandy, who had no mean opinion of himself, built, I could see, certain speculations on that basis. The old lady never came without Eliza; and when a visit was expected, Mr. Catchpole brushed his fiery hair into the most killing curls, and changed the out-at-elbows coat for the smart one he wore out of doors, and beautified himself as far as that was practicable. Well, a message came one day that the old lady was ill, very ill, with an urgent request that some one should go at once and make her will. Off went our Adonis as fast as a promise of something liberal over the fare could urge the cabman. When he arrived, the old lady was alive—just alive enough to tell him that all her property was to be left to Eliza. She told him that in the hissing whisper which supplied the place of the cracked voice; but when she came to the word "all," so full was the poor old creature of love for the niece: or, perhaps, of determination—let us hope not hate against her son—that she half rose up in her bed and clenched her withered hand, and shrieked out that word again. It must have been a terrible sight—that of life struggling with death for a will. It was a short matter to write that will down; and Catchpole's pen flew over the paper, and the old eyes that were glazing so fast stared anxiously the while, and the thin fingers actually held the pen she had asked for beforehand ready to sign the paper. In a few minutes all was ready; but what a difference that few minutes made. The clerk had risen from his seat and approached the couch, when the surgeon, who stood on the other side, said, with that coolness which medical practice brings, "It is too late; and—it was too late. The dead fingers clenched the unused pen so tightly that they had to be unclasped from it. The son was heir of all, and Eliza a beggar. Death had translated that screamed- out "all" into none. The sequel is soon told, The property was wasted by the son, and has long since passed into other hands, and Eliza, instead of possessing some thousands a year, and being woed by Mr. Catchpole, is a faded daily governess.

Every lawyer's office has plenty of such tales as this. One I remember of a miser who had ruined more than one family, and in his last moments wished to make such reparation as bequeathed gold could compass. Poor wretch, when the will was brought, catalepsy had seized him. He could not move his hand; his tongue refused its office; only his eyes were free to move; and of those eyes I have been told a terrible tale. He was, as misers often are, a man of strong mind and iron nerve. Passive as he was in every other part, the eyes told all that was passing within. You could have seen in them intelligence when the will was read to him; the powerful volition brought to bear, and persevered in, when the written word which was to make it a testament was required; the terror and horror which came over him when he found the right hand, which had so often aided him for evil, would not help him for good; the despair which burst the unseen bonds around him, and, with a convulsive motion, let out the last of life. It must have been a spectacle of horror, when punishment came in the shape of a prohibition of the one act of mercy, which might have made some amends for a lifetime of wrong.

Then there was another legend of a man whose daughter married against his will. He lived somewhere in a retired country-house, far off from any town. This man was subject to a disease of the heart, and one night, feeling the symptoms of an approaching attack, and that strange presentiment which so often comes before death, he roused his household, and sent off a messenger on horseback, not for a surgeon, but for a lawyer He wanted his will made instantly. The messenger could not be expected back for at least two hours, and long before that the spasmodic attack had come on, but still in the intervals of his paroxysms, that determined man wrote as though against time. When the lawyer did arrive, all that was left of the will which had been so active and energetic a few hours before, was that last piece of writing. It expressed the deceased's intention, in the strongest terms, utterly to disinherit his rebellious child, and to give his property to some charitable institutions It was complete, even to the signature; only the flourish usually added to the name was wanting, as though there the hand had failed. But that writing was not a will; it was not in proper form, nor attested. In the eye of the law it was but an invalid piece of paper, and the daughter took that which her birthright entitled her to.

Wills generally afford a frightful temptation to the worst part of our nature. I believe that more cunning, more falsehood, more worldly anxiety, and more moral wrong are blended with the subject of "wills" than with the whole mass of law parchments extant. A will should not only be properly made but properly placed, and more than one should be cognizant of its whereabouts. I have known many cases of gross turpitude in the shape of destroying wills, and can record one rather curious anecdote affording a vivid illustration of unprincipled greed defeating itself. Two gentlemen in the City, close friends from their school-days, were in the decline of life. Mr. Edmonds had a large family, with comparatively small means; while Mr. Raymond was worth two hundred thousand pounds, with no living relative but a nephew, of the most profligate character. This nephew had been expensively educated, and had spent unlimited money for the worst of purposes; and the uncle at length became wearied and disgusted with the young man's utter depravity. "Edmonds," said Raymond, one day to his friend, as he handed him a roll of paper, "here is my will. I have left my nephew ten thousand pounds, and the rest of my property to you, who, I know, will make good use of it." Edmonds remonstrated, and implored, but was eventually compelled to take the will, and lock it up in his private desk. Within a few months, however, by dint of constant entreaty, Edmonds prevailed upon his friend to make another will, and just reverse the bequests, leaving the nephew the bulk of the property, and Edmonds the ten thousand pounds. This will Edmonds read, and saw safely deposited in Raymond's iron chest at his private residence. Within the following year Raymond died. The nephew found the will, and, as it afterwards appeared, such was his baseness, that, to secure in addition to the rest the ten thousand pounds left to Edmonds, he immediately burnt the document, knowing that, if his uncle died intestate, he himself was heir-at-law. On this villanous announcement, Edmonds sinking his conscientious scruples, produced the first will made by Raymond, and claimed the chief of the property; and the unprincipled nephew, after making full confession during a fit of delirium tremens, destroyed himself.

A Curious Coincidence.

"Speaking of coincidences," said the man with a wooden leg as he lighted a half consumed cigar he had been carrying in his handkerchief speaking of coincidences, gentleman, I can tell you a very similar thing. I was going up Niagara street, in Buffalo, when I saw a man with a wooden leg on the other side of the street coming down. We looked across at each other and stopped. Says I to myself, and says he to himself:

"'That fellow lost his leg at the battle of Gettysburg, or I'm a sinner!'"

"Well?" asked one of the group.

"We looked at each other across the street for a moment and then says I to myself and says he to himself:

"'I'll strike him for a quarter and the old comrade and sufferer will shell out.'"

"Well?"

"Very curious coincidence, gentlemen—very curious," continued the man as he puffed away at his old stub. "We met on the cross-walk. We shook hands. We struck each other for a quarter, but didn't get it. We were both dead broke. Neither of us was in the battle of Gettysburg or any other battle. Then says I to myself and says he to himself:

"'Blast his eyes! but he's a traveling on his shape and telling a tale of woe, and he's no man for me to associate with!' and so we walked off. I don't like coincidences myself; there's no money in 'em."—New York Sun.

Buffalo Bill's Autograph.

When Buffalo Bill was in Washington, shortly before Congress adjourned, some of the Senate pages captured him and extorted about a hundred autographs from him. "Boys," said Mr. Cody, "I am willing to give you one autograph apiece. Now, don't ask for more." The boys promised, and by ones and twos presented their books. After he had written his name fifteen or twenty times Cody became suspicious and asked how many pages there were, "Thirty," he was told, though there are but half that number. It was the appearance of a red-headed page that gave the game away. Cody seized him by the ear and asked him if he hadn't been in before. "Yes," said the scamp, "twice, but that is nothing, some of the boys have been in three or four times." Buffalo Bill's autograph is worth twenty-five cents in Washington to go in a book containing the signatures of President, Cabinet, Supreme Court, Senators, and the most prominent Representatives, Such a book sells at $5, and Buffalo Bill's signature thrown in as a sort of a chromo.

WHAT is the matter with the dramatic profession? Hardly a week passes now without the details of some scandalous divorce case, and it can not truly be said that the profession does not furnish more than its fair proportion to the cases of infringement upon the code of morality and of violation of the seventh commandment.

IN a small country town in Illinois a doctor who had been practicing there for more than a year was pelted with eggs by a delegation of indignant lady patients who had discovered that he was a mere ignorant quack. He deserves no sympathy. A country doctor so indiscreet as to let his lady patients discover a fact of that kind about him ought to be pelted.

THE FARM AND FIELD.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO THE WESTERN FARMER.

Farmer's Barn Yards--Make a Good Garden--Window Gardening--Strawberry Beds--Seed Sowing.

Farmer's Barn Yards.

Some day, when you have nothing else to do, take a ride through the country and count all the neatly-kept barn-yards you see. Even if you have other duties, go, if for no other reason than out of curiosity. In a ride of twenty miles you will not see ten half neatly-kept barn-yards, and not more than two—more likely not one—as it should be kept. You will see a wagon here, another there, over there a sled and in another place a hay-rack, flat on the ground, all ranged about the middle of the lot; and besides all these things you will see plows, corn-planter, harrows, small hay-stacks, piles of boards, rails, posts and many other things I cannot now enumerate, thrown around in a haphazard way that ought to put any farmer to shame. Not a blade of grass to be seen, when there should be a well-sodded yard.

In thinking of the many, many farmers I have known, I can remember but one who has a well-kept barn-yard. And, as the yard indicates, he is a very methodical farmer. "A place for everything and everything in its place," is his motto, and the entire farm shows that his motto has become a reality, not a mere theory.

When he drives into the lot his wagon has a place of its own; each piece of machinery has its own place. Nothing is left in the center of the lot for a horse to run over and perhaps cripple itself. This barn-yard furnishes pasture for two work horses during the summer nights, and for four or five calves through the entire summer, yet it does not contain over two acres. But the horses are never allowed to run in it when the gronnd is soft. Of course, it never becomes cut up and rough. The farmer has hauled plenty of gravel about the barn, and little or no mud is found there.

As most barn-lots are along the road in line with the house-yard, one would suppose as much care would be taken to keep them in order as is used on other premises. There is just where you are mistaken, as a ride will convince you. The house-yard may be perfectly neat and the adjoining barn-lot may be a perfect slough of filth and disorder.

Why do not these men realize that their lots are but lots on an otherwise lovely picture? Why not use a little forethought when driving in with machinery and vehicles? It takes no longer to drive a wagon to the same place each time, than it does to unhitch wherever the horses may happen to stop.

"But," says one, "I haven't room.

You think you have not room simply because your lot is in such a confused jumble that you do not know yourself how much room you have until you "size up," as the housekeepers say. Just try it once; if not for you own satisfaction, do so for the pleasure of the people who pass your place. At first they may make remarks and be inclined to wonder what can have taken possession of you, it is so unlike you to have order in your barnyard. But never do you mind their talk, when this systematic plan has become a habit with you, others may be led, seeing your "light," to "go and do likewise."

Make a Good Garden.

No man should spend his labor and time over so large an acreage as to fail in making a first-class garden. In this much of the satisfaction and often no little part of the profit of country and farm life consists. It is rather disheartening for the city resident who goes into the country during summer for fresh air and the fresh home-grown small fruits and garden vegetables to look into back yards and find tin cans carelessly thrown away, which show that even for such common table luxuries as tomatoes, green corn, and often green peas, the farmer and his family have nothing better for him than he could himself buy at the retail grocery. If farmers wish to attact other men to their business, as it is clearly their interest to do, they must in every way make farm life as pleasant and enjoyable as possible. Labor-saving machinery enables the farmer to take life easier if he will. He complains that low prices for staple crops take off all his profit. Grow less of these crops then, and devote a larger share of time to fruit, especially the small fruits, and to garden vegetables. So soon as the farmer grows enough of all kinds of vegetables for table use in their season he has procured luxuries that only wealthy men can afford. As he thinks over what he would have been obliged to pay for such delicacies, the harder lines of his life fade away. It seems worth while to live on a farm, and when he gets to feeling this way it is ten to one that he falls into the habit of marketing surplus he does not need, and thus after a few years developes into market gardening the natural way. First make a garden that will supply your own table with all garden delicacies, and if there is a surplus it will be sure of a profitable market.

Window Gardening.

Now that the chief brunt of the winter has passed, something may be done in the way of repairing damages. Where the shrubs in the window boxes are brown and seared I should be disposed to remove them, and fill in the boxes with spring flowers of a hardy nature. Canterbury bells make a wonderful show in a good sized box, and as soon as the show is over they can be cleared out and the boxes filled with something else, There is a wonderful charm in variety, and there are many hardy plants that might be used in a similar manner. Forget-me-nots, primroses, daisies, wall-flowers, pansies, violas, carnations, and pinks are all suitable for a change; in fact, outside window gardening has hitherto run too much in one groove, the only things used being a few exotics in summer, and a few shrubs in winter. Plants inside the window, in many cases, want a thorough cleansing with soap and water to remove the impurities lodged thereon by the fires and dust created by the long severe winter. It is rather soon yet to report; but the soil may be looked up ready—Gardening Illustrated.

Strawberry Beds.

These should have a thorough clean up and a heavy mulching of farm-yard manure. The Dutch hoe should be run through the rows, and the beds raked lightly before applying the mulch. If the soil is of very heavy nature, and subject to cracking on the surface, it may be pricked up with a fork, but light soils are better when not disturbed except by the hoe and rake. In mulching them, pack plenty of the material close up to the plants. Go over all autumn-planted beds, and tread the soil firmly about the plants, mulching these beds likewise with some mild kind of manure; only poor land will require rich mulchings. Young plants of strawberries standing in nurse beds should be planted out 20 by 24 inches apart on a plot of deeply trenched and thoroughly manured land, planting them firmly. Put a large label to mark each variety, and make notes of the names and position of each variety, in case of the loss of the labels. Those who make a practice of planting their forced plants should now get the land dug for them, so that it may settle before planting time arrives.—Gardener's Chronicle.

Seed Sowing.

A sowing in shallow drills, 9in. apart, of French horn or early Nantes carrots, should be made on the south border. In preparing the ground, take advantage of a fine day, so that the surface soil may become somewhat dry before sowing the seed, and a dressing of wood ashes may be applied before the drills are closed, as a manure, and remedy against wire-worms. Early Milan turnip seed should be sown in drills 1 ft. apart. A small sowing only should now be made, and again in three weeks. Large breadths are undesirable at this early date, as the plants run to seed rapidly. Radishes should be sown on the south border, the turnip-rooted varieties being employed. Cover the radish beds with dry litter until the seeds come up, when it should be taken off in the day and replaced at night.

Tubers and Roots.

The remaining roots of parsnips left in the ground should be dug up soon, the sound ones being stored in moist earth or sand in a cool place. The remaining artichoke tubers should be dug up and stored as advised for parsnips. Planting tubers may be put into a heap, protecting them with litter from frost, until the ground is in readiness for planting. In digging up the crop of artichokes, it is better to open a trench at one end of the piece of ground and clear out every tuber or bit of one. The trenches may be manured at the time of digging, thus making the land ready for other crops.

Farm Hints.

The borer which attacks the currant stems may be kept in subjection, says the Michigan Farmer, by cutting and burning all the infected stems. In stems that cannot be spared go for the borer with a knitting-needle.

This season there is more water in the soil than has been the case for years. Cellars that have always been dry, in some sections, are now partly filled with water. This will probably not be lessened, as we are yet to have the usual spring rains.

Michigan has a cow insurance club. On joining, each person pays into the treasury 75 cents for each cow in his possession, and when a cow belonging to a member dies, an assessment is made and $40 is paid to the loser. After the initiation fee the members are required to pay nothing except the assessments.

Range cattle are rapidly becoming a thing of the past, and the stock farmer may breathe easier. With the constant encroachment of the homesteader and the farm, the almost boundless range and the days of the vast herds are surely numbered. Like the Indian and the Buffalo, they will soon become a thing of the past.

Young chicks will become afflicted with lice as soon as hatched. The lice leave the fowls and go to the chicks. As soon as a hen comes off with a brood rub a few drops of melted lard or oil on the skin of the head and neck of the hen, and dust the chicks well with Dalisatian insect powder.

No breeder or farmer should believe or accept as a fact that any breed of swine or any individual animal is perfect, says the National Stockman. The force or strength of the meaning of the word "thorough-bred" increases with the improvement of the quality of the animals. No one realizes the worth of the adage that "the best is none too good" with more force than the true fancier and breeder. He is always looking for his ideal higher type and when found will pay fabulous sums for it.

HIS TURN CAME AT LAST.

The Conductor Gets Even on the Chronic Joker.

He was the chronic car joker on that line of road, and seldom boarded the train without guying the conductor or left it without raising a general laugh at the company's or trainmen's expense. Yesterday, however, he arrived late at the station and barely in time to swing on without a ticket. He had just caught his breath, after seating himself with the usual daily crowd of fellow travelers, when the conductor appeared.

"Haven't got any ticket," began the joker in his usual vein, and the crowd awaited its daily guy.

"Never carry anything so small," and the traveler picked out a $20 bill, but did not pass it up.

"Make out your receipt first," he continued, "I'm all business to-day." Then as the receipt was duly punched out, he took it and began a long and labored inspection of it, still holding on to his $20 bill, at the same time aggravating the busy conductor with superfluous questions: "Engine all right? Airbrakes or handbrakes? Newsboy chained? Any rebate on this ticket? Punched it all you want to? Any stop-over allowed?" etc. As the conductor began to tire of the business, the funny man handed over his $20 bill and suddenly drew it back, adding, "One question more: Is this a through train?" "Bet your life," replied the conductor, taking the bill, "and what is more," he added, pocketing the bill and deliberately moving away. "it's through without 'change," and the entire car smiled at the funny man and his disappearing $20 bill.—Buffalo Commercial.

Friends.

"It is the edict of the world," said the man—"'laugh and the world laughs with you weep and you weep alone.' Friends are many when the purse is long, but when care and affliction comes—ah, how is it that I should know this sad truth, that in such times as these friends are indeed few! The loyalty of friendship is something I have long consecrated in my inmost heart of hearts. One should be free with all possessions, but should be miserly of his friends. Make friends as you treat life's earlier path. Keep constantly fortifying your stock of friends, or the latter will soon pass from you. The friends of our youth are no doubt the best of all; enduring through life without thought or need of change. As Thackeray said. "We are so much alone in this world; you who have anything to love hold that friend to your heart—and thank God!"—Detroit Free Press.

Halstead's Story of Sherman.

Mr. Halstead told me a story of General Sherman. The editor was in Washington as a newspaper correspondent at the outbreak of the war. He met Sherman there, as a colonel. One day in a party of soldiers and newspaper men the subject of the loyalty of the inhabitants of Washington came up, when Colonel Sherman grimly said: "The loyalty of the people of Washington is such that if our troops in the capital should be attacked and meet with reverses, the women of Washington would cut the throats of the wounded on the sidewalks with case knives." There were observing correspondents in the party who held the same opinion, but were chary of expressing it, and in comparing notes afterward they predicted a future for Sherman, on account of his keenness of scrutiny and his oddness of expression.—New York Press.

Census of a Cheese.

Dr. Adametz, a Swiss scholar, has been taking a census of the inhabitants of a cheese. The microscopic examination of one "gramm" of a fresh Emmenthaler cheese, such as is sold in England under the name of Gruyere, contained no fewer than 90,000 so-called microbes. This prodigious encampment, after seventy days, proved to have increased to a tribe of 800,000. Another sort of cheese contained within a single "gramm" board and lodging for about two million microbes, while in a "gramm" cut from the rind of the same cheese Dr. Adametz found about five million of these inhabitants! A piece of cheese upon our tables of a few pounds' weight may consequently contain more microbe inhabitants than there are human inhabitants in the whole world.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Lincoln's Shaving Story.

Abraham Lincoln was so busy during the critical period of the war that he used to receive visitors to the White House while he was being shaved. Lincoln had very hollow cheeks, or "lantern jaws" as they are called, and was therefore a difficult subject to shave. One morning Senator Cole, of California, called up on him on a very important matter. Lincoln who was being shaved at the time and did not wish to discuss a private matter in the presence of his barber, told the following story: "Senator," said he, "you may have noticed my lantern jaws. Well, in order to shave my cheeks properly the barber has to put his thumb into my mouth to force out my cheek sufficiently to give the razor a chance. Well, one day before I was so big a man as I am now"—this with a sad smile—"the barber out West who was shaving me cut through the cheek and slashed his thumb. With no apology for my suffering he withdrew the bleeding member from my mouth and said angrily: 'D—your lantern jaws; you've made me cut my thumb?"—New York Press.

"Sho's y' live—d' co'plexion kims aftah d' blood—what's dis he—a—beau'ful co'plexion guar'nteed if d' blood am pure! Befo' d' Lo'd dat am salvation fo' Aunt Sophy."

All we claim for it is an unequaled remedy to purify the blood and invigorate the liver. All the year round you can depend on Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in all cases of blood-taints or humors, no matter what their name or nature.

It's the cheapest blood-purifier sold through druggists. No matter how many doses of other medicines are offered for a dollar.

Why? Because it's sold on a peculiar plan, and you only pay for the good you get.

Can you ask more?

"Golden Medical Discovery" is a concentrated vegetable extract, put up in large bottles; contains no alcohol to inebriate, no syrup or sugar to derange digestion; is pleasant to the taste, and equally good for adults or children.

RIDICULING AN INVENTOR.

Opposition in Europe to Engineer Stephenson's Proposition to Build a Railroad.

George Stephenson, the celebrated engineer, used to speak with indignation of how the "Parliment men" badgered and baffled him with their book learning when he proposed to build a railroad from Liverpool to Manchester.

"The smoke from the engines'" said those learned men, "will kill the birds, and the sparks will set fire to the fields and houses. The passengers will be made seasick; the noise will frighten away the game, and thousands of coachmen and innkeepers will be thrown out of employment.

The fast mail coaches were driven at the rate of ten miles an hour. When Stevenson asserted that his steam coaches would attain a much more rapid rate of speed, he was laughed at and hooted at as a crack-brained enthusiast.

"You must not claim a speed over fifteen miles an hour," said the nervous counsel of the promoters of the railroad to Stephenson, just as he was about to appear before a parliamentary committee.

A member of the committee, opposed to the proposed railroad, thought he could make the simple-hearted engineer assert an absurdity that would kill the project.

Well, Mr. Stephenson, he asked, "perhaps you could go seventeen miles an hour?"

"Yes."

"Perhaps twenty miles an hour?

"Certainly."

"Twenty-five, I dare say. You do not think it possible?"

"Dangerous, though?"

"Certainly not."

"Now tell me, Mr. Stephenson; will you say that you can go thirty miles an hour.

"Certainly."

The fish was hooked to an absurdity, so every member of the committee thought, and they all leaned back in their chairs and roared with laughter.

Two Barnums of Connecticut

It is rather a curious fact that Phineas T. Barnum was the means of introducing his namesake, William H. Barnum, to public life. The two men were no relation to each other, we believe. Phineas T. Barnum was nominated to congress in the Bridgeport district. It was strongly republican, and his election would have been natural. But there was some opposition to P. T. Barnum as a showman. William H. Barnum a wealthy manufacturer was brought out against him by the democrats, and there first displayed the election tactics from which he afterward became famous. He not only won the election, but he revolutionized the district, which went from the republican side over to the democratic party permanently.—Boston Herald.

Queer Face Ornamentations.

At any time from 16 to 22 years of age the male Esquimaux have their lower lips pierced under each corner of the mouth for labrets. When the incision is first made sharp pointed pieces of ivory are put in.

After the wound heals the hole is gradually stretched to half an inch in diameter. Some of the poorer natives wear labrets made from cannel coal, ivory, common gravel and glass stoppers obtained from ships, which they shape for the purpose. All who can obtain them have agate ones.—Washington Letter.

Jas. Meehan, Jr. Editor and Prop.

The presidential party is having a high old time. It must be a great day for manufacturers of artificial flowers along the line.

The Mapleton Banner got out a creditable illustrated issue last week. Both the citizens and the publisher are to be congratulated. The advantages of Mapleton were strongly brought out.

The united efforts of the citizens of the whole Red River Valley, collectively and individually, to induce immigration hither, are already beginning to tell. The demand for farming lands increases.

The Great Northern road may be receiving many kicks from the country press of the district which it traverses, but the fact remains that it is doing a great immigration work in the interests of the Red River Valley.

The Fisher Bulletin last week was twelve years old. The Bulletin, since under the editorial supervision of Col. J Starr, is one of the best-written local papers we receive, and it is always a pleasure to read his easy lines. May the Bulletin prosper, and Fisher, too.

Count Von Moltke, the great German general, is dead and buried. This closes a most illustrious life. Von Moltke was the German military idol; his brilliant career was the result of a self-appreciation, and the proper application of a peculiar faculty and massive intellect. He has triumphed in his purpose—that of many—temporal glory. Others who live after him will read and admire, and his life may be a light to lead others on to nobler efforts.

The Toronto Globe says there were 100 people, at the Grand Trunk depot in Montreal, on the 9th inst., being transferred for points in this country, and that generally the farmers are disgusted with tariff laws, which they claim works against them, charging the government with imbecility in this matter. The tide has become so great that Church and State are working hand in hand to stay the exodus, or to turn the stream upon their own western provinces.

It is expected that the Immigration Board of the Red River Valley will have a car of sight seers and land seekers through this part of the country as soon as the seeding is done and the fields begin to look green and promising There is no better time to show up this country than when the fields have put on their coats of velvet green and all nature has on her best habiliments. The influx to this country this year will be very great and the amount of letters that are daily being received by the secretary of the board shows what is being done. The amount of advertising done by the Great Northern road is very great and the result will be felt by every one in the valley.—Hallock Enterprise.

Pope Leo has bestowed his apostolic benediction upon the world's Fair and the plan to erect a monument in honor of Christopher Columbus at Buenos Ayres: He says: "It is proper as well as useful homage to men who have merited so well of Christian faith and human society Columbus in accomplishing by his genius and perseverance such great deeds, has been the fountain in both hemispheres of so great influences upon mankind that few men men can be compared with him. Hoping that the honors rendered will serve to stimulate the World's Columbian Exhibition at Chicago, we give to your project the praise that it merits, and at the same time as a token of fraternal love we give the apostolic benediction.'

The Meanest Man Found.

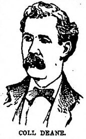
There are some mean men, but an Aitkin county man is awarded the bakery. He sold his son-in-law half of a cow and then refused to divide the milk, mantaining he had only sold the front half. He also required his son-in-law to provide all the food the cow consumed and compelled him to carry water to her three times a day. Recently the cow hooked the old man and he is now suing his son-in-law for damages. —La Prairie Magnet.

A Bean Baker's Rare Coins.

The finest coin collection in all Boston is that of Parmelee, a baker up on East Chester Park. He bakes nothing but beans —Boston baked beans—and all the money he makes he puts into old coins. His collection is worth between $40,000 and $50,000. He had a complete set of American silver dollars—the only set in Boston to my knowledge. What makes this set hard to fill is the scarcity of dollars of 1804. There are only some thirteen or fourteen of these in existence, and they are worth $700 apiece. I don't believe there are any floating around the country undiscovered. The dealers know where every one of these dozen and odd coins are, and can't be imposed upon by a counterfeit, for the great value of this particular coin has caused it to be counterfeited, or, rather, to be imitated by taking dollars of 1801 date and fixing them over.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

DEANE'S DEATH PREDICTED.

Voudoo Voght's Vicious Prophecy Chances to Be Fulfilled.



COLL DEANE.

Much excitement was recently caused in San Francisco by the sudden death of Coll Deane, a prominent broker, who had incurred the displeasure of Voudoo Voght. Voght is a mysterious individual, who claims supernatural power as the "Sheriff of God." Mr. Deane had conducted some speculative business for him which resulted in a loss of $3,000. The "Sheriff of God" became enraged like an ordinary mortal over this misfortune, and declared that unless Deane made good the loss he would die at a certain hour on a certain day.

Mr. Deane refused to recoup the voudoo, and he died suddenly on the day and hour named. This strange fulfillment of Voght's prophecy led to suspicion of foul play. A post-mortem examination, however, showed that Deane's death resulted from hemorrhage of the stomach caused by ulceration. There seemed to be no contributory cause, such as fright or nervousness, produced by the knowledge of the prediction.

While many saw nothing but a strange coincidence in Deane's death as prophesied, a number of superstitious people are satisfied that Voudoo Voght possesses supernatural influence, and is a man to be propitiated. Voght appears to be of that opinion himself, since he is enlarging the sphere of his dismal forebodings and putting other people under the ban. It is recalled that in 1855 he made a remarkable cure of Felix Feist, who had worried himself into the belief that he had Bright's disease. While Feist was congratulating himself on his restoration to health Voght said:

"You have no right to live, for you are a bachelor and no good; but as I am Jesus Christ, I will allow you to live five years longer, but in five years you must die."

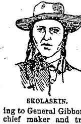
No particular attention was paid to this declaration, as Feist gained in health and strength. He, however, died of Bright's disease exactly five years after Voght's singular announcement.

The voudoo turned his battery of prediction on W. A. Benjamin, the partner of Coll Deane, but Mr. Benjamin appears to be proof against it. The time fixed for his demise passed without any physical disturbance of note. But nothing daunted, Voght has appointed another date for Mr. Benjamin's sudden taking off. He has made an "official" announcement of this. "Deane," he proclaims, "was the first one to fall under the condemnation of the supreme government of the universe in the crusade against falsehood and wrong. He will not be the only one."

There is some talk of putting this too active voudoo professor under restraint as a dangerous lunatic.

HE SIGHS FOR LIBERTY.

An Imprisoned Indian Against Whom There Are No Charges.



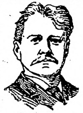
SKOLASKIN.

Attention is being directed to the case of Skolaskin, an influential chief of the San Puell Indians, who has been confined at Fort Alcatraz, the military prison of the division of the Pacific, for eighteen months without having had a trial or being convicted of any crime. The sole reason for his detention, according to General Gibbon, is that he is a mischief maker and tried to raise trouble among the Indians in the northwest. General Gibbon says, being a ward of the nation, the military authorities have a perfect right to place him where he can do no harm.

This is rather rough on Skolaskin, who claims to have done no wrong, and who is pining away in confinement. "My heart is broken," he told a reporter recently, "and I want to go home to my wife and three children. I am all alone here, with nobody to talk to and nobody to keep up my spirits. I am lame and cannot walk much, so that the freedom of the island which is given me does not do me much good. I am nearly always in my cell pining for liberty. I do not know why they keep me here. I never did any harm. One time somebody killed a cow. It wasn't me that did it, but Chief Joseph, who hates me, wrote a paper to the old soldier chief (General Gibbon) at Vancouver, and the next thing I knew I was brought here."

Skolaskin has petitioned several times for a hearing, but so far has been unable to obtain any response to his appeals for release.

The Causes of His Downfall.



HENRY ARK.

Henry Ark, secretary of the Coast Seamen's union, San Francisco, offered the common excuse of wine and women for his downfall when he was arrested for felony recently. An investigation of his books showed that he had converted $2,500 of the union's funds to his own use, his peculations extending over the entire period of his secretaryship. Ark says he wants to be sent to state prison, and he will undoubtedly be accommodated. He was violently in love with a fast woman, treated her to expensive wine suppers and was extravagant in supplying her demands for finery. When arrested he had a revolver in his pocket, and he is to be tried also on a charge of carrying concealed weapons.

All Flavored with Foolishness.

The latest idiocy in the way of tests of endurance is that of sitting on ice. Two or more lunatics engage in the rivalry, and the one who can stand the cold the longest gets the money. Quail eating, oyster eating, whisky drinking and pie eating contests are of every day occurrence, to say nothing of fasting contests, where men literally starve themselves almost to death. The most senseless craze of all, however, is the latest, known as the "sleep fast." The first sleep fast, which lasted 168 hours, ended at Detroit, Mich., recently. Six contestants were entered, but the only one to stick it out was George Cunningham. This sleep fast is a most dangerous experiment. If a man succeeds in coming through with his intellect still balanced, his health is necessarily shattered, at least for the time being, and the chances are that he will never be himself again.

Juvenile birtdday celebrations hold sway and are the only ripples on the otherwise calm social waters. Willie Smith entertained his fellow Sunday School students Monday evening, it having been his 12th birthday anniversary. Willie and his friends took possession of the parental abode and spent an evening of unusual enjoyment.

A. D. Wishard, of Red Lake Falls, the agent for F. T. Day Land Mortgage Company, was in the city on Tuesday, looking after his farming interests. A pleasant dance was given Friday night at the old schoolhouse building. About twelve couple were present. Prof. J. P. Dargan and Prof. W. J. Dargan, two of our celebrated violinists, together with an accompanist on the organ furnished most excellent music. The repast, furnished by the ladies, would have have tempted an invalid to eat. Erve McCaffrey distinguished himself as the host, white Edmund Bray as the impromptu floor manager endeared himself to all- especially the ladies. Altogether it was a happy event.

A stray doctor who has been selling nostrums and practicing without a license was dealt with rather summarily Sunday evening. A whalebone whip wielded with a practical hand was heaard cracking around the nether limbs of the unfortunate disciple of pills—nor were his nether limbs protected by the McHale bloomer. The lash was applied to him rather vigorously. He left town before daylight Monday morning and failed to pay his respects to McGinnis whom it is claimed did the lashing. The white caps or purification committee as they may be termed met in a large livery barn and endeavored to make the intoxicated doctor engage in a pugilistic encounter with the light weight from Winnipeg. Winnipeg came to the scratch at the call of time but the doctor sized him up and beat a retreat. He was corralled at the door and lashed as above described. The next time this traveleling quack engages in the practice of medicine he will no doubt refrain from intoxicants.

Joseph Helm intends to be a wheelman and has sent for a Courier, which is one of the standard makes of safeties.

It Is To Teach The Ladies.

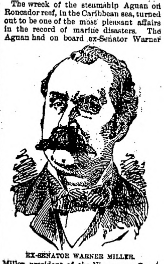
NEW YORK, April 18.—Among the cabin prssengers who arrived from Europe today by steam ship "La Bourgogne," fourteen Parisian designers of ladies' fashionable gowns. These artists have been engaged by the enterprising manager of THE NEW YORK AND PARIS YOUNG LADIES FASHION BAZAR, to contribute exclusively to the colums of that popular magazine. All of them are well known in New York, for their reputations have preceded them. Mrs. Astor, the Vanderbilts, Mrs. Cleveland and Mrs. Marshall O. Roberts are among the society leaders who have worn gowns designed by these artists. During an interview with a reporter one of the designers said:

"Paris still leads the world of fashion although Eugenie no longer sits on the throne. Parisian gowns have a style about them that can not be equaled. That, I suppose is the reason why we have been engaged to come to America to teach the ladies of your beautiful country, through the columns of THE NEW YORK AND PARIS YOUNG LADIES' FASHION BAZAR, how these wonderful creations of the dress-makers' art are constructed. It is our business to design the handsome and most fashionable gowns for the different seasons of the year. These designs will be printed in colors and will be accompanied by such clear instructions as to the selection of materials and the cutting and fitting of the garments that no woman of sense will have the least difficulty in making perfect-fitting gowns herself. It is a knack, a science, to fashion a gown that will make a very small and very fleshy lady appear slim. Not one designer out of a thousand can hit upon the true lines unless he makes it the study for a life-time. You ought to see the May number of our Magazine. We have designs in it that will take the hearts of the ladies by storm. They do not get a new dress made up every day, and I can tell you it is an important item to get the best magazine, and the very latest and most exquisite Paris styles, and have it fashioned like the one that is best suited to their figure."

PLEASURES OF SHIPWRECK.

Castaways Have a Jolly Picnic on Roncador Reef.

The wreck of the steamship Aguan on Roncador reef, in the Caribbean sea, turned out to be one of the most pleasant affairs in the record of marine disasters. The Aguan had on board ex-Senator Warner Miller, president of the Nicaraguan Canal company, two English engineers, several American capitalists and lady members of their families, and several newspaper correspondents who were bound for San Juan del Norte to inspect the route of the proposed ship canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. She left New York under the most auspicious circumstances March 14. From that day until March 26 all the pleasures of a yachting trip were enjoyed. The weather was delightful, and the passengers enthusiastic over the beauties of the tropical seas.



EX-SENATOR WARNER MILLER.

Early on the morning of the 26th the ship struck the coral reef. The rasping and shaking noise of the contact brought every one on deck in various stages of undress. For a brief period there was excitement and terror, but before daylight the absence of danger was apparent, and crew and passengers posed for their pictures before leaving the vessel to seek shelter on a desert island seven miles away. The photographer was Miss Scribner, daughter of the Hon. G. Hilton Scribner, of Yonkers, N. Y.

Passengers and crew—ninety-three in all—reached the island in safety, and at once set about making themselves comfortable. Abundant provisions were secured from the wreck, tents were erected, and with the inherent love of constitutional forms of procedure which characterizes most Americans, a provisional government was formed with ex-Senator Miller as executive officer. A boat was dispatched to the mainland to apprise an anxious world of the disaster, and the party settled down for as delightful a picnic as was ever experienced. One of the newspaper men says the whole affair went off like a well planned summer's outing. Food, water and amusement were abundant. The tropical breezes tempered the hot sun and made day and night comfortable. Besides, there was a good supply of champagne and other luxuries.

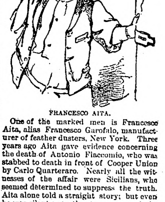
IN TERROR OF HIS LIFE.

A Wealthy Italian of New York City Who Fears Mafia Vengeance.

Facts are continually coming to light which show that the Mafia, whose terrible operations in New Orleans threatened a complete rupture between the United States and Italy, is active in various parts of America. It is stated with every show of authority that there are men marked for death in every large city, and the frequent assassinations of Italians are now laid at the door of this band of murderers, who seem to regard human life as of no account whatever when it comes into conflict with their nefarious designs.



FRANCESCO AITA.

One of the marked men is Francesco Aita, alias Francesco Garofalo, manufacturer of feather dusters, New York. Three years ago Aita gave evidence concerning the death of Antonio Flaccomio, who was stabbed to death in front of Cooper Union by Carlo Quarteraro. Nearly all the witnesses of the affair were Sicilians, who seemed determined to suppress the truth. Aita alone told a straight story; but even he was silent as to the true cause of the killing. Still he told too much, and was marked for vengeance, as the murder, there are good reasons to believe, was planned by the Mafia to rid themselves of a man who had become obnoxious to one of its prominent members.

Aita did everything in his power to escape the vigilance of this dread society. He dyed his hair and mustache, changed his residence and his name to Garofalo, and rarely went out in the daytime. Until a short time ago he thought his disguise was perfect, but the receipt of threatening and decoy letters recently show that the relentless organization of assassins has not abandoned its intention of murdering him.

Aita has double padlocks on his doors and goes constantly armed. He is determined to sell his life dearly, but is in constant fear of an ambush. The matter has been called to the attention of Inspector Byrnes, who will doubtless be able to protect Aita against the bloodthirsty designs of his persecutors.

The Cow Was Full of Wine.

Animals as well as men sometimes get under the "inflooence." Recently a Frenchman who lives at Pasadena, Cal., was astonished to see one of his best cows lying apparently dying in front of his barn. The animal lay there inert, with open eyes, oblivious of everything. The man called a veterinary surgeon, who could not diagnose the case, and a butcher was sent for to bleed the animal. He was some time in arriving, and when he did come the cow was found eating at a haystack, but with legs a little uncertain. An investigation followed, and it was found that the cow had eaten copiously of the refuse of a neighboring winery. This stuff, composed of grape skins and stems, had fermented and induced a state of intoxication.

BEN BUTLER predicts another war and intimates that he is ready to volunteer again as a major general. Is Ben getting short of spoons.

A YANKEE has just invented a nitro-glycerine shell that can be thrown ten miles from a cannon with ordinary powder. This, it is suggested, is likely to have a very conservative effect upon the present raging and rampaging Italian belligerency.

THERE is one good thing about the "deadlock" in the Senate over a proposed drag-net partisan investigation of the canals; it will reduce the chances—if any exist—of the passage of the bills to grab Battery and City Hall Parks for corporation purposes.

THE following amusing advertisement, evidently written in good faith, appeared recently in a West coast paper: "I want to let my furnished house shootable for legations or any other mon. And if it does not shoot the legation, can shoot himself elsewhere. Apply to——"

AMERICANS who are shocked by occasional revelations of wickedness in public life in their own country find some relief in a perusal of the disgraceful stories which find the light in the royal and official household of Great Britain. America is bad enough but England is unspeakably wicked.

A MAN in Lansing, Mich., having languished 33 years in prison for murder, is now released, a helpless and pitiable wreck, his innocence proved. The State has pardoned him, but who shall pardon the State, which now refuses to support him because the records are lost?

GERMANY has her grain corners as well as America. It appears that the business is not quite so successful as here, however, for it is announced that if the members of a corn ring recently formed at Berlin are discovered they will be expelled from the bourse.

THE British government does not propose to have the Chilean nitrate ports closed off-hand by Balmaceda, and have notified him. Most of the nitre used in the manufacture of gunpowder come from these beds, and their closure for any great length of time would be a great calamity to the "civilized" world which needs so much of the article for the purpose of bulldozing its neighbors.

GEORGE W. WILLIAMS, the colored orator, has visited Africa and makes a serious charge against Mr Stanley. Williams accuses Stanley of using an electric battery to convince the natives that the white man was powerful as their gods. The next thing Stanley knows some one will accuse him of employing medical skill to demonstrate to the natives that he was superior to their medicine men.

A BUTCHER of Seymour, Ind., is said to have found in the stomach of a slaughtered cow a silver half-dollar, several small bones, a lot of needles and pins and a quarter of a pound of iron nails. But a more remarkable discovery was that made by a servant in a St. Louis restaurant. While he was opening clams the other day there dropped from one of the bivalves a gold ring inscribed "S. S. to R. S." The clams had been purchased from a New York house and were gathered from the ocean bed near Fire Island.

M. PAUL CRAMPEL, a French explorer, has given an account of the Bagayas, a pigmy race, inhabiting the great forests north of Ogowe, who appear to be related to the Wambuttis of Stanley's expedition. They live among the M'fangs, to whom they are in a measure subject. The Bagayas hunt ivory for the M'fangs, and receive manioc and bananas in exchange. The M'fangs are about 5 to 9 inches to 6 feet high, whereas the Bagayas are 4 to 7 inches.

PROF. C. A. L. TOTTEN, of Yale, has finished his computations based on biblical truths, and stakes his reputation on the prophecy that the second coming of the Messsiah will occur before the year 1896. He says, however, he doesn't anticipate the end of the world before the expiration of a million years or so. The coming of the Messiah, he says, will simply make the world better, as his previous advent did. It is doubtful whether his reception will be more cordial than it was before if he disagrees with present crystallized systems of theology.

IN GRANT'S MEMORY

The Great General's Sixty-Seventh Birthday Commemorated by the People of New York.

Ground Broken at Riverside Park for the Monument to Mark Gen. Grant's Grave.

NEW YORK, April 29.—Amidst the plaudits of thousands of citizens, the beating of drums, the booming of cannon, the melody of children's voices and the eloquence of orators, ground was broken to-day for the monument which is to be raised at the tomb at Riverside Park, where rests all that is mortal of the greatest of the heroes of the war of the rebellion—the immortal Grant.

There, upon the hillside, gathered the members of the Grand Army of the Republic and a number of other bodies and, ranging themselves around the tomb, paid reverence to the memory of him whom all nations honored while in life. On the Hudson river, decorated with bunting, lay anchored opposite the tomb the war ship Yantic, and at 2 o'clock her guns commenced to belch forth a salute of twenty-one guns, which were heard at intervals of thirty seconds. On the platform near mound were gathered the members of the monument association, the members of Alexander Hamilton post, G. A. R., the leading members of the various Grand Army posts and the orators who had been elected for the occasion. Before the regular ceremonies commenced, Lawson Fuller, at the head of 800 children from the sheltering arms institution and a drum and fife corps playing "America," that marched past the tomb with flags drooped, each carrying a bouquet of forget-me-nots, which was cast upon the tomb. The marine band played an overture, after which Rev. Dr. Clark Wright, chaplain of Department Commander Freeman's staff, offered prayer, and a chorus sang "The Star Spangled Banner." Commander Freeman presiped.

GEN. PORTER'S SPEECH.

In a few well chosen words, he introduced Gen. Horace Porter, the orator of the day. Gen. Porter said, in part:

"Sixty-nine years ago to-day, there was ushered into the world a being who was destined to stand pre-eminent in the history of his country, and whose fame was to reach into the uttermost parts of the earth. Most of the conspicuous characters in hostory have risen to prominence by gradual advances, but U. S. Grant came before the people with a single bound. Almost the first sight caught of him was in the blaze of his camp fires and the flashes of his guns, those wintry days and nights in front of Fort Donelson. From that time until the crowning triumph at Appomattox, he was a leader whose name was the harbinger of victory. From the final sheathing of his sword till his ashes were laid to rest in yonder tomb, he was the chief citizen of the republic and the great central figure of the world."

The chorus sang "America" when Commander Freeman arose to initiate the particular ceremony of the day—the breaking of the ground for the monument. Before turning up the sod Commander Freeman said:

In the presence of Almighty God and these witness we, the representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, break the sod preparatory to laying the foundation of the monument which shall stand as a slight expression of the love of this nation for its great chieftain, and shall tell to all the world that the United States of America does not forget her heroic dead."

At the close of his remarks, Commander Freeman took the spade in his hands, and with it tossed up the earth. This ended the ceremonies, and the crowd dispersed.

GRANT'S BIRTHDAY.

NEW YORK, April 28.—The annual dinner in commemoration of the birthday of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant was given to-night at Delmonico's.

All the guests were seated at round tables, in the center of which were banks of flowers over which were placed inscriptions indicative of the character of the great hero. One was "Tender Hearted," another "Uncomplaining," others "Home Loving," "Faithful" and "Unobstrusive."

A notable feature of the dinner was the appearance of Mrs. Grant in the gallery, accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Sartoris, and her child. When the party appeared in the gallery after the toast to the memory of Grant was drank in silence the gentlemen present all stood up and greeted the wife of the great soldier with applause.

Speeches were made by Senator Evarts, Col. H. K. Douglass of Baltimore, Frederick Taylor of New York, ex-Congressman Wise of Virginia and Col. William McMichael of Philadelphia.

The first annual dinner of the Harlem Republican club was given to-night at the Metropolitan hotel in honor of the birthday of the late Gen. Grant. Hon. James G. Blaine and ex-Gov. Foraker of Ohio, were expected to be present and speak, but did not appear. The order of speeches was as follows: "Gen. Ulysses S. Grant," Gen. George H. Sheridan; "The Republican Party," Hon. John S. Wise; "A Free Ballot and a Fair Count," Gen. James R. Obeirne. "Veterans of the War," Gen. Cyrus Bussey; Col. Thomas P. Ochiltree was to have responded to the toast "Recollections of Gen. Grant by a Confederate," but was taken sick and had to be removed from the room.

THINKS SHE IS A MAN.

The Delusion of an Insane Stage-Struck Chicago Girl.

CHICAGO, April 26.—About two years ago Lizzie Eggerton became stage struck and wanted to join a comic opera company. Her parents objected, and through disappointment the girl was driven to insanity. Last night she was taken to the detention hospital.

She is twenty-two years old, and her delusion is that she must wear male attire. A few days ago she had her hair cut off. The following day she went to a clerk in a clothing store and was measured for a suit. She claimed to be an actress. The clothes were made in the latest fashion, and Lizzie created quite a sensation in the vicinity where she lives.

She insists that she is not a woman, and when taken to the hospital she refused to take off the male attire.

Went Suddenly Insane.

CHICAGO, April 29.—Cyrwin Stoddart, a wealthy resident of Philadelphia, was taken suddenly insane at the Palmer house Sunday and attempted to commit suicide by throwing himself from the window. To-day with great secrecy he was removed to a private asylum near Milwaukee. The event it is feared will result in serious legal and financial difficulties his family. Stoddart is a member of the dry goods firm of Stoddart & Co. of Philadelphia. Overwork resulting from business complications caused by the death of his partner brought here a short time ago is the cause of Mr. Stoddart's insanity.

A POISONING CRAZE.

Numbers of Deaths in Denver Thought to Have Been Caused by Arsenical Poisoning.

DENVER, Col., April 2'.—This city at present seems to be possessed of a craze prompting the taking of human life by arsenical poisoning. Saturday the entire country was horrified by the mysterious death of Mrs. Barnaby of Providence, R. I., which was caused by this means. This has caused an investigation as to the means of death of several, and to-day it is stated that no less than seven have died within the last two months from the deadly drug.

Sunday Annie Armstrong, a domestic in the family of a prominent minister, died in the most horrible agony, and an examination showed enough arsenic in her body to kill six people. She was apparently contented and the idea of suicide is not entertained, and how she came to take the poison is a mystery.

Young Harry Cheny, employed in the printing houses here, died suddenly last week, under the most peculiar circumstances, and an analysis of the viscera to-day by Dr. Burr revealed enough arsenic to kill a family. No more explanation can be made of this case than that of the Armstrong girl.

A month ago Mr. Harting, his wife and six children were taken violently ill immediately after partaking of their dinner. The physicians pronounced the case one of trichinosis, and despite their greatest efforts the mother and four children died within a week and the remainder of the family lived, but are still very low. Since the Barnaby sensation became public, physicians exhumed the body of one of the Harting children and made an analysis, finding a sufficient quantity of arsenic to cause death. There can be no doubt the others died from the same cause. Mrs. Hartings was but thirty-two years old, had had eleven children and did not enjoy the happiest of lives. It is supposed she became despondent and tried to kill her entire family.

Miss Armstrong was a domestic in the employ of the Rev. Mr. Hansen, the Swedish Lutheran minister of this place. Mr. Hansen was seen this evening, and says that it was impossible for the story to be true. But Prof. Hedding, the chemist to whom the viscera was taken, says that, while he has made no complete analysis, he has made some experiments which indicate that her death was caused by arsenical poisoning.

CHEERING NEWS.

President Harrison Informed That His Sister Is Out of Danger.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 29.—Dr. Hughes of Cleves, Ohio, who is the attending physician of President Harrison's sister, Mrs. Easton, who was injured in a runaway accident yesterday, telegraphed the president this morning that Mrs. Easton is out of danger.

After the receipt of the telegram it was announced on behalf of the president that the programme arranged for to-day and the remainder of the week would be observed unless other and less favorable news of Mrs. Eaton's condition should be received.

After lunch at Sutro Heights this afternoon the presidential party drove to the military reservation at Peosido, where a great crowd of people were in attendance. The president reviewed the troops stationed at the post and witnessed the artillery and cavalry drill. The party then returned to the hotel for dinner, and this evening there was a reception at the Palace hotel. The president and Mrs. Harrison received the representatives of the army and navy first, and then a large number of invited guests. Several bands of music were in attendance during the reception.

The president and party will make a tour of the bay to-morrow, and in the afternoon will view the launching of the armored coast defense vessel Monterey.

SAYS SHE IS SANE.

Anna Dickinson's Doctor Still Claims That Her Mind Is Sound.

NEW YORK, April 29.—Miss Anna Dickinson was sitting up in bed when a reporter called to-day. She seemed very tired and her voice was hoarse.

When asked her plans she said they were in the hands of her manager. She did not know what she was to do, but she would prefer to give weekly lectures in this city rather than travel and would prefer the stage to either.

Dr. Seward, her physician, condemns the newspapers for reporting Miss Dickinson's lecture in such a way as to make it appear that she is insane. He stakes his professional reputation on the statement that she is sane.

Dr. Seward said it was true that several prominent men had tried to make Miss Dickinson wife or mistress, and failing in this had persistently traduced her. She had documents to prove all she said.

Mr. McGeachy, Miss Dickinson's manager, said this afternoon that arrangements had been made for Miss Dickinson to remain in New York and give a lecture every Sunday evening. The lectures will be confined to political topics. Mr. McGeachy added that he intended to take Miss Dickinson to Europe in June, and return in time to open in New York next season and give dramatic readings. Possibly, upon her return, she may reappear as a dramatic star.

VON MOLTKE DEAD.

The Great Prussian General and Statesman Dies Suddenly at an Advanced Age.

Failure of the Heart's Action Ascribed as the Cause of His Death.

BERLIN, April 25.—Count von Moltke, the great Prussian general, died here to-night.

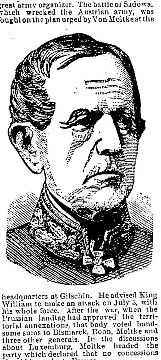
He attended the session of the reichstag held this afternoon. His death was very sudden, and the physicians who were summoned announced that it was caused by failure of the heart. He died at 9:45 p. m., passing away quietly and painlessly.

The news of the count's unexpected death has caused great sorrow in this city.

Hellmuth Kari Bernhard von Moltke was a direct descendant of John Garve, second laird of Coll, who was a chieftain in Scotland about 1435. In fact he was a Maclean of the house Mac Iain Abrach, his grandfather having been a son of one of the lairds of Coll. The grandfather and one of his brothers went as young men to Copenhagen.

Von Molke was born at Parchim, Mecklenburg, Oct. 16, 1800. His father was a Danish general, and he was educated at the cadets' academy of Copenhagen. He entered the Prussian service in 1822, and in 1832 he was admitted to the general staff of the Prussian army.

Hellmuth von Moltke first appeared in history in 1838, during the war between Turkey and her revolting vassal, Ibrahim Pasha of Egypt. Moltke was then a Prussian captain in the sultan's camp, a military observer. For two years he had helped the sultan to effect military reforms, but, when the critical moment came, Huziz Pasha refused to follow Moltke's excellent counsel to fall back to Biridshik, bring up reinforcements and risk a battle, and the Turkish army was disgracefully routed at Nisib, in June, 1839.



Moltke was instinctively a first-class chief of staff and a bold and cautious strategist, and his magnificent talents came into full and effective play in the war against Denmark in 1864, and with Austria in the summer of 1866, the success of which was chiefly due to him and to Von Roon, the great army organizer. The battle of Sadowa, which wrecked the Austrian army, was fought on the plan urged by Von Moltke at the headquarters at Gitschin. He advised King William to make an attack on July 3, with his whole force. After the war, when the Prussian landtag had approved the territorial annexations, that body voted handsome sums to Bismarck, Roon, Moltke and three other generals. In the discussions about Luxemburg, Moltke headed the party which declared that no concessions should be make to France.

In 1869 Moltke presented the king with a plan of campaign against France, carefully worked out in its minutest details, so that mobilization could have taken place at once. Three armies were to advance at once over the French frontier and take the French unprepared. This plan was carried out with terrible effect in 1870, and Moltke was with Bismarck in Douchery when the negotiations for capitulation at Sedan were consummated. The next day the whole French army was bagged, together with the Emperor Napoleon. Then Strassburg fell and Moltke was raised to the rank of count. In December, when the Germans were smashing the remaining fragments of the French military establishment, Moltke ordered the formation of a Southern army, which he put under the command of Manteuffel. On June 15, 1871, when a large portion of the German army returned to Berlin, Moltke was made a field marshal general.

Moltke next appears in the German reichstag in 1874, when the imperial military law was laid before the house placing the army on a peace footing at 401,659 men. The party of Progress and the left wing of the National Liberals opposed it. Moltke made a long speech reviewing the political condition of Europe and the military arrangements of Germany and other powers, and urged the unconditional acceptance of the measure. After a sharp wrangle Moltke agreed that the proposed peace footing should last seven years, or until Dec. 31, 1881.

When the new army law came up, Moltke vigorously defended it. It covered the period from 1881 to 1888, and proposed an absolute and relative increase of the military strength of the empire, and it was urged on the ground of the increase of the Russian and French armies. Several classes, hitherto included in the reserve, were included in the active list, and the peace footing was increased to 1 per cent of the whole population. Moltke made a long defense of the bill, picturing the danger from Russian and French aggression, and the bill was finally passed by a vote of 186 to 128. Gen. von Moltke was distinguished for his thorough faith in big armies, which, he always said, are the best peace makers. He has written voluminously on military and other subjects. He had no superior in Europe as a planner of campaigns and a discoverer of the weak spots in an enemy. He married an English woman as did his assistant, Count von Waldersee.

An Irreparable Loss.

ROME, April 25.—A few of the people who were injured at the time of the explosion yesterday have since died from the effect of the injuries they received. Reports of further damage to valuable and historic works of art in the Vatican, monasteries, churches and palaces are made, and it will require a personal visit to and inspection of tens of thousands of artistic relics before the full story of the disaster can be recorded. The pope had just concluded celebrating low mass when the explosion occurred. So severe was the shock that he tottered and would have fallen had not one of the servants sprung forward and caught the venerable prelate in his arms.

THE DESIRE FOR REFORM

EX-GOV. MORTON ON THE FEELING IN THE WEST.

Tariff Reform Still in the Front—Why the Farmers Are Not Deceived by Talk About Pauper Labor—Work of the Reform Club and How to Sustain It.

Ex-Governor J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, has recently spent several weeks in New York, making his headquarters while there at the Reform Club. It will be remembered that it was this club which took so active a part in the Congress elections last fall in Iowa, Michigan, Illinois and other Western States.

Governor Morgan showed while in New York a deep interest in the tariff reform propaganda which the club has undertaken. Being himself a non-resident member of the club, he was delighted to find that all the money paid to the club in the way of annual dues by out-of-town members goes directly into the work for tariff reform.

To a member of the club he said on this point: "Every earnest tariff reformer in the West ought to be a member of this club. Every man who can pay $10 a year will have the satisfaction of knowing that every penny of this goes towards supplying the sinews of war in this fight against an iniquitous tariff system. There are a great many men in the West who are able and willing to pay this sum, and would gladly do so if their attention were only called to the matter.

"The protectionists have the advantage over us in one important respect. They can 'fry the fat' to an almost unlimited extent out of those who have large financial interests in protection. Now with us the case is different. On our side the financial interest in abolishing protection is not so great with any one individual. There are many manufacturers who are interested to the extent of thousands of dollars a year in keeping up protection. The opponents of protection have a financial interest in abolishing the system; but as with them the interest of each man is less than on the protection side there is less disposition to contribute money to carry on your educational campaign.

"Now it seems to me that there ought to be many men who are willing to join this club and give $10 a year to help you to keep up this agitation. The legitimate expenses of your work of organizing meetings at distant points and sending out speakers to them and also in supplying tariff-reform matter to a large number of newspapers must be very great. The country should come to your help."

Gov. Morton was asked whether the desire for tariff reform was growing in Nebraska.

"Yes," he answered, "the yearning for commercial freedom is becoming more and more general and more and more intense among the farmers of the Northwest.

"They find that protection compels them to buy of American manufacturers their farm implements at artificially enhanced prices. The Oliver steel plow, made at South Bend, Ind., sells for less in Canada than in the United States, and so—very often—do Diston's saws. And while the Northwestern farmer buys in a protected he sells in a free trade market. His meats and breadstuffs are fixed, as to prices, by the Liverpool and London markets. He sells against all creation, and he buys where all creation is shut out from competing with the pampered protectees of the McKinley tariff.

"The farmer sees that the profits of capital are the leavings of wages. After operatives are paid off the dividend fund is left, as is also a sinking fund, betterments and other increments, for the manufacturer. The farmer knows that under protection millionaires, in manufacturing ventures, have spawned and throve, like skippers in a cheese, all over the Middle and Eastern States. And it follows logically that the great fortunes—made with greater celerity in America than elsewhere on earth—like Carnegie's, must arise from very large leavings of wages for division among the capitalists.

"For this reason farmers, mechanics, and laborers generally are beginning to discriminate between high wages and high cost of labor. It is plain to them that a skilled laborer in the United States, who gets in steel-rail manufacturing $4 a day, may leave the finished steel rail with less cost of labor in it than a less-skilled, less-alert artisan in England leaves in the steel rail made there by labor costing only $2 a day.

"Denominational wages are one thing and the cost of labor is another; the former may be very high and the latter very low. Some farm hands are cheaper at $25 a month than others at $15. The cost of labor in grain grown by the former is less than that cost in grain grown by the latter sort of labor. One good farm hand will cultivate well forty forty acres of corn in Nebraska, and get from that area 2,000 bushels. But a lazy, inefficient, slovenly man will half till the same acreage and produce only 1,000 bushels. If the former is paid $20 and the latter $15 a month, the cost of labor in the 1,000 bushels is much greater than in the 2,000. The Alliance people are now thinking upon this economic question, and will not easily be bamboozled by the McKinley assumptions and assertions about 'protecting the wage-earners.'

"Alliance men are among themselves absolute free traders. They sell to the merchants who will pay highest for farm products, and then they buy of those who will give the most commodities for those products, direct or in cash. The farmer and his merchant trade with each other just as long as they each find it advantageous to do so. The moment either finds the exchange unprofitable, trade between them stops—unprofitable commerce always dies. All legitimate exchanges are mutually advantageous, both between persons and between people—nations.

"The United States had a growing trade with Europe. Her merchantmen flecked every sea. Transoceanic commerce grew apace. It must have been profitable, or it would have perished of its own unprofitableness. But it grew and grew until the Morill tariff—and now the McKinley tariff—was enacted to kill it—to abolish that which was mutually profitable—to eradicate the commercial advantages which—under comparative freedom—were mutual, natural, just and righteous."

Labor Does Not Believe It.

The silk-workers have had hard experience in the matter of wages for the past year. Reductions in wages are very frequent in the silk industry just now, and the Master Workman of the Silk-workers' Association declares that wages have in some cases been cut down 50 per cent. within a year.

It is only natural, therefore, that the silk-workers in their recent convention should have passed the following resolutions:

WHEREAS, The silk industry of the United States, despite the high protective tariff, is at present in a most deplorable condition, wages being so low that skilled operators are seeking other occupations, and in view of the fact that since 1889 the wages of ribbon weavers have been reduced 58 per cent., be it

Resolved, That the representatives of the United States Silk-Workers of North America, now in session, appeal to the friends of American labor not to purchase silk fabrics of foreign manufacture, which are actually inferior to those made here; and be it

Resolved, That in our opinion neither protection nor free trade benefits the workman, and we therefore call upon all silk-workers who are unorganized to band themselves together into the national body, and it is our further opinion that the only protection workingmen will ever receive will be that they give themselves.

The silk industry is protected by duties of 50 to 60 per cent. Why does not this protection secure good wages to the workers?

LET THE POOR USE SHODDY.

So Says Judge Lawrence, of Ohio—Carpets of Shoddy and Cow Hair—Greed of Protective Interests.

Judge Lawrence, one of the Ohio political wool-growers, writes to the Boston Journal of Commerce a long letter advocating the total exclusion of carpet wools from this country.

"The duties on carpets," says Judge Lawrence, "are substantially prohibitory; they are entirely so on all carpets of classes made in the United States. The duties on coarse wools should be equally so, even if used only for carpets."

Although we grow almost no carpet wool in this country, for the simple reason that it pays better to grow clothing wool, Judge Lawrence would exclude foreign carpet wools entirely, and thus compel the carpet manufacturers to use in their carpets some of the low grades of wool now going into cloth. This would increase the price of Judge Lawrence's wool; and that is just what he is striking for. But it would increase the price of carpets, too. Here, however, the Ohio shepherd proposes a frank and brutal way of making a low grade of carpet for those who are compelled to buy cheap stuff. He says use shoddy. Here are his words:

"If a still cheaper variety of carpets be required, as there always will be, they can be made from a mixture of such coarse wool with shoddy and cow hair sufficiently cheap."

Judge Lawrence ought to know that our cheap carpets are already made largely of "shoddy and cow hair." Recent improvements in shoddy spinning machinery, however, are rapidly increasing the use of shoddy in carpets.

The frankness and the audacity of Judge Lawrence's declaration for shoddy carpets for the poorer people should enlighten these people somewhat as to the spirit of protected interests generally. That declaration is but another proof that these protected interests are ready to enrich themselves at whatever cost to the people. Let all the poorer people in the land use shoddy carpets, but Judge Lawrence must have his wool duty!

But the day of these wool politicians is passing. Even such a dyed-in-the-wool protectionist paper as the Journal of Commerce tells Judge Lawrence something for his benefit which shows how the tide is setting. The Journal says:

"It is our impression, from the knowledge we have of the sentiment of woolen manufacturers on the tariff question, that the aggressive policy of wool-growers or their representatives will, in time, and that not far distant, arouse an antagonism on the part of manufacturers to all tariff restrictions on the imports of raw materials, regardless of threats concerning the tariff on manufactured articles."

A Window-Glass Trust.

There was talk of the formation of a window-glass trust last fall during the campaign. At that time Secretary Foster, who is largely interested in the manufacture of window-glass, was reported to be opposed to the formation, being then a candidate for Congress. One or more of the other large manufacturers held out against the trust proposal, and the scheme came to nothing then.

The talk about a trust has again been revived, and now the trust is considered much more probable. The New York Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter, which is an organ of the glass trade, has recently pointed out how the difficulties formerly encountered have mostly disappeared, and then continues:

"Another deterring cause has been removed by the appointment of Mr. Charles Foster to the Treasury portfolio in the President's Cabinet. Mr. Foster controls large glass manufacturing interests and at the same time is prominently identified with politics. He was a candidate for Congress when the subject of a consolidation of glass interests was first mooted, and the public outcry against trusts made him at once an enemy of the scheme, because to be connected with such a movement at the time might have ruined his chances of political preferment. As he is now placed in a position where condemnation of commercial combinations by the public—under mistaken impressions or otherwise—is likely to do him and his political aspirations no damage, his co-operation, at least, in the scheme may be expected"

The same journal points out that one of the leading manufacturers has recently put up prices 20 per cent. Such is the working of the high McKinley protection on glass. Trusts and higher prices are the order of the day.

A Hinge Trust.

The Iron Age, a high tariff trade paper, prints the following piece of news:

"The negotiations which have been in progress for some time between the manufacturers of strap and T hinges have resulted in the formation of a strap and T hinge association, which consists of the following concerns: Stanley works, McKinley Manufacturing Company, E. W. Gilmore & Co., Lindsay & McCutcheon, C. Hager & Sons Hinge Company. A new list has been adopted. The new prices represent an advance on the goods generally ranging from 5 to 10 per cent. on strap hinges and something like 20 per cent. on T hinges."

Thus the industries of this country are gradually being consolidated into trusts. It is said by a competent authority that nine-tenths of our industries are already controlled by trusts and combinations to control prices and output.

The old duty on these hinges was 2½ cents a pound, and was practically prohibitory, only $2,377 worth of bolts, rivets, hinges, and hinge blanks having been imported last year. McKinley made the trifling reduction of a quarter of a cent per pound, leaving the rate still substantially prohibitory, as may be seen from the fact that this hinge trust is able to raise prices from 5 to 20 per cent.

There may be some dispute as to whether or not our manufacturers have the right to form trusts. However that may be, our people are great fools to continue to vote for the high protective duties which give these trusts a defense against outside competition. When industries combine and put up prices, it is time to cut off their protection at a single stroke.

IMPORTED INDUSTRIES.

WHY A GERMAN MANUFACTURER DID NOT BUILD HERE.

The High Tax on Raw Materials Frightened Him—This Tax Would Keep Him Out of the World's Market—Pauper Labor and Pauper Goods.

The high McKinley duties on many kinds of goods have already compelled some European manufacturers to set up factories in the United States to get their part in the tariff spoils, and still others will doubtless be induced to open branch establishments here.

Republican organs print news about these imported industries with many expressions of satisfaction, and point to the importation of industries as one of the best effects of the McKinley tariff law. But they do not reflect that when a mill-owner in Europe goes to the trouble and expense of shipping his machinery to America, building a new factory and putting it into operation, there must be some special hope of gain held out to him. Protectionists assert that the tariff lowers prices; but clearly the foreign manufacturer does not come here to get lower prices for his goods. He comes for higher prices—for McKinley tariff prices.

An interesting case, however, is that of a German manufacturer of woolen goods, who came here to look over the ground and went home without deciding to build a plant in America. His reasons for not building here are highly interesting from a tariff standpoint. The manufacturer gives the reasons why, after careful observation in his travels and upon ripe reflection, he concluded not to transfer his industry to this country. The first of these he declares to be the high duties on raw wool, yarn and dye stuffs, which make it hard for American manufacturers to compete in the home markets with their European rivals, notwithstanding the heavy duties on woolens, and impossible to secure an outlet for their surplus products in neutral markets. While the American manufacturers of woolens are absolutely and inexorably confined to the home demand, their competitors in England, Germany and France, with free wool, have the world for their customer.

While this manufacturer found the high duties on wool a great hindrance to cheap woolen manufacture in the United States, he did not find near so great a difference in wages as the protectionists have often asserted to exist between this country and Germany. He says that, after personal inquiries in the industrial districts of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, he finds that the average rate is scarcely 25 per cent. higher than in Germany. He asks what this amounts to when the woolen products are subject to duties ranging from 80 to 100 per cent. Yet the advocates of protective spoliation incessantly repeat the fiction that the McKinley tariff is so adjusted as only to compensate American manufacturers for the difference in wages in this country and in Europe.

The fact is that when the actual production of a day's labor is taken into consideration the wages in the woolen factories of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts are lower than in France and Germany. This has been conclusively shown by experts who have examined the processes of manufacture in this country and in Europe, and have made comparisons as to the actual labor cost in a yard of goods.

Such a comparison the protectionists will never make. They always take the wages paid in Europe by the day or by the week, and compare them with the daily or weekly wages in the United States. Yet it must be clear to even a half-intelligent mind that the only valid comparison is that of the labor cost in the yard, the pound, etc. On this point the great contention of the protectionists as to the "pauper labor" of Europe breaks down completely; for if we can make a yard of cloth with less labor than they can in Europe, it is folly to talk longer about the "pauper-made goods" of Europe.

Truck Farming.

Truck farming is market gardening carried on so far away from centers of consumption as to require railway and vessel carriage to get the products to market. Long lines of railway have made such farming possible, and now North and South Carolina planters can daily send their "truck" to Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. So far the Census Bureau finds that about 600,000 acres of land are devoted to this kind of farming, and that $100,000,000 are invested in the industry, and that the annual products are worth nearly $80,000,000 after paying freights and commissions. These farms employ 217,000 men, 9,000 women, and 15,000 children. Seventy-six thousand horses and mules are employed in the work, and nine million dollars' worth of implements. This industry has sprung into existence in the past ten years, and is growing very rapidly. It seems like pretty good farming which realizes $130 gross income an acre on the land tilled.

THE bad outlook for the European wheat crop has caused an advance in the price of wheat in our markets. The foreign demand for our wheat, it is thought, will be unusually large this year. As the foreigner buys more largely of our wheat, our farmers learn the importance of their foreign market. Would it not be a good thing to enlarge and extend the foreign market for our farm products by taking foreign goods more freely in change for them.

HUNGRY HORDES.

They Wander Hopelessly About the Great Cities.

WANT AND WEALTH SIDE BY SIDE.

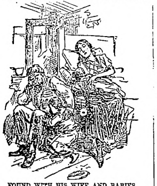
The Gleam of Gold Attracts the Unemployed to Centers of Population, and the Result Is Often Distressing—The Teeming Tenements of New York.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

TO THE reflective and philanthropic mind perhaps no question presents more profound interest than that of the existing poverty in the cities of the United States. With the growth of material prosperity and the increase of population in great centers of activity this evil has rapidly increased. Now and then, through the newspapers, the public learns that John Jones, a sober and industrious workman, has been found with his wife and babies in a dying condition from lack of food. Perhaps never before, except in times of pestilence, have so many of these pitiful stories been read as during the last winter. Those who read utter a sympathetic word and shudder as they think of their own babies. Then the incident is forgotten. If it happens to possess some peculiarly sensational features, as, for instance, was the case when a carpenter tried to jump from the Brooklyn bridge because he could get no work, John Jones is overwhelmed with provisions, money and jobs.

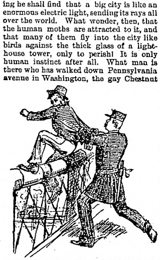
But the case of John Jones is only a bubble on the mighty current of poverty ever flowing through large cities. The wailings of hunger from thousands of infant throats never reach ears attuned to sympathy, and cemeteries are peopled every day with those who have slid from poverty's knee into the serenity of the grave.

As Americans are a progressive people, however, and as many have gotten together so much money that chasing the nimble dollar has lost its zest, they naturally turn attention to other things. And among those poverty is receiving at the present time a good deal of notice. In the effort to ameliorate existing conditions one naturally asks, with Artemus Ward, "Why is this thus? What is the reason of this business?" Of course the conclusion is quickly reached that the inherent selfishness of man or the inhumanity referred to by Mr. Pope is the first cause. But this answer does not satisfy. The public wants something more specific. Then the question becomes as wide as the sea and as fruitful of answers as the problems of metaphysics. The first and chief practical reason is because so many human beings are packed into a limited area that the natural and artificial resources of the locality will not support life in decency and comfort. An illustration of this fact is seen in the prodigious increase in the tenement house district of New York city during the past twenty-one years.



FOUND WITH HIS WIFE AND BABIES.

In 1869 there were 14,872 tenements, with a population of 468,492 persons. In 1879 the number of tenements was estimated at 21,000, and their tenants had passed the half million mark. In 1888 the tenement houses had increased to 32,390, with a population of 1,093,701 souls. At the present time there are 37,316 tenements, and their population is over 1,250,000. These statistics, it is safe to assume, hold good, according to the ratio of population, in all the great cities in the United States. If one inquires into the causes of this overcrowding he shall find that a big city is like an enormous electric light, sending its rays all over the world. What wonder, then, that the human moths are attracted to it, and that many of them fly into the city like birds against the thick glass of a lighthouse tower, only to perish! It is only human instinct after all. What man is there who has walked down Pennsylvania avenue in Washington, the gay Chestnut street in Philadelphia, or the still more ornamental and attractive Broadway in New York, but has felt the delightful sense of human companionship which the hurrying crowd affords, to say nothing of the attractive windows gleaming with color and the almost endless means of amusement! Besides, the emigrant's objective point is almost invariably a large city. Often his money only enables him to land in the city, and he cannot get away. He wouldn't if he could. Then that great gaunt specter of competition salutes him. He can only work with his hands, and anybody with health can do that. Consequently he cannot get a job at cleaning the street, the railroad has more men than it knows what to do with, and the 'longshoreman wishes that a pestilence would come and kill off some of his competitors.

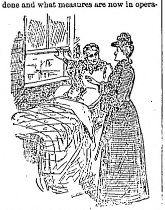


TRIED TO JUMP FROM BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

Another cause of the poverty in large cities is the increased cost of living. Everything the poor man buys must be bought from a middleman. Fresh milk, which costs him five cents a quart in the country, requires the expenditure of an additional three cents. The vegetables he purchases as a rule are stale and unwholesome. He could pluck them from his own garden in the country. He is also tempted to spend more money in the city than elsewhere. If he has a few blocks to go he takes a car. He would walk twice the distance in the country and think nothing of it. Then, too, there is that hungry monster, "Rent," to be fed. Once every month he comes around, open mouthed and greedy, and swallows at least one-quarter of the poor man's income. One-quarter of his wages to give him a shelter from the cold and rain! and he, poor fellow, because of his ignorance, does not know that he is mainly responsible for the inordinate price of his rent because he insists on remaining in the overcrowded hive.

By way of contrast, look for a moment at the present condition of a people who live outside of large cities. Take Ireland, for instance. Scarcely a day goes by but what some heartrending tale is told of the frightful misery on account of poverty in that country. The writer knows, as the result of personal experience, that there is more destitution and poverty in the tenement district of New York in one week than he saw in the Emerald Isle in three months' travel among the peasants. The poor Irishman has less money in Ireland than in America, but he has more pure air; less meat and more fresh vegetables, and he pays less rent. These conditions would hold equally good in the country districts of America.

Now as to remedies. What has been done and what measures are now in operation to relieve the distressed poor? Philanthropy has been tried and found wanting. It serves very often as a means of temporary relief, just as a sniff of camphor relieves the headache, but it does not touch the root of the disease. You cannot make a useful citizen of a tramp by giving him ten cents. A hickory stick and a bucksaw, with the consciousness that he can earn a dollar, will do the business much more thoroughly. Samuel J. Tilden once said that the only practical solution of the social question was through politics. This remark was brought out by the fact that much of the misery of the poor is due to their own heedlessness and ignorance. The beneficent influence of education now in operation throughout all large cities will do much to rectify these defects. Economy in thousands of poor families is an unknown quality. When they have money they spend it lavishly in one or two days, and go without for the rest of the week. The most pitiful exhibition of ignorance is seen in the case of the children.



DIDN'T KNOW ENOUGH TO SHUT THE WINDOW.

Mrs. Fiske Bryson, a female physician of New York city, says that she has visited hundreds of homes where the parents of sick children did not know enough to shut down the windows when there was a fall in temperature of 15 degs. Numbers of instances are also on record where tenants have stolen the brass fittings of wash tubs and the connecting lead pipes and sold them for old junk rather than use these conveniences for sanitary purposes.

Still, with all these discouragements there is no real reason for hopelessness. The practical men in America have learned that the only way to lessen the more flagrant evils of poverty is to tackle the evil in a businesslike way, and to leave sentiment entirely out of the question. Chicago has taken hold of the subject with a will and with every prospect of success. Felix Adler, the apostle of ethical culture in New York, reports that the model tenement scheme which he was mainly instrumental in starting is paying 5 per cent. on the money invested. The board of health of New York has increased its visits of inspection to crowded tenements; old rookeries are being supplanted by substantial, well ventilated buildings, and many of the more sanguine humanitarians are positive that if poverty isn't dead it will at least be hamstrung by the time the Twentieth century is born.

Vol. VIII No. 19. RED LAKE FALLS, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, ~~APRIL~~ May 7 1891. TERMS, $1.50 PER YEAR

To whom it may concern:

ST. PAUL, Minn., March 2d, 1891.

The painting season is near at hand, and everyone has a House, Barn, Floor, Buggy, or some article of Household Furniture that either requires a coat or two of paint, or else would be beautified by it.

The use of paint is economy in the truest sense of the word.

Now, painting, like any other business proposition, resolves itself in a great measure, into a question of dollars and cents.

Ready-mixed paints are yearly gaining in favor, excepting in places where inferior and worthless articles have been sold and used but it should be borne in mind that these goods are not all alike, for good mixed paints are made. Special machinery, pure ingredients, and many years of experience will produce a better paint than can be made hand-mixed, by any one.

We justly claim to manufacture a grade of ready-mixed paints, of a very high standard. Combining the purest of materials by the use of the latest improved machinery, and skilled workmen, we offer to the public, through our agents, an article that cannot but prove absolutely satisfactory to the consumer in point of durability and fine finish. It requires no skill to apply them, merely ordinary care and intelligence.

The first cost of a paint is a minor consideration; a cheap mixture will not possess more than about two-thirds the covering qualities of a good one, and the fact of its being adulterated to that degree is conclusive proof that it cannot withstand the action of the elements upon it. Do not be misled by offers made you of a paint at a price which is often as low as a manufacturer can afford to sell a reliable article at wholesole. Competition is now so keen in every branch of business that excessive profits are no longer possible; therefore bear in mind that the merchant selling at a seemingly low figure, is undoubtedly making as much profit as the one handling a good Paint, and that the difference in price is represented by the difference in quality.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1.—The National Capital has not been so dull for many years at this season of the year as it is now. With President Harrison and several members of his cabinet away on the Pacific Coast; with the absence of congress, or at least not a dozen senators and representatives in town, and it being the off presidential year, all tends to make it unusually dull and quiet here. Secretary Blaine of late has been the busiest cabinet officer, and until within a week or two has been in hot water, ever since congress adjourned, over the Behring Sea Seal Fishery dispute with England, and the Italian incident. The Behring Sea trouble, by the postponement of the Sayward case in the supreme court until next fall, may perhaps give the opportunity for a settlement of the controversy by arbitration before the court meets again in October. A jug-handled arbitration by our supreme court which will bind our own government, but not England, is not particularly desirable to secretary Blaine, and so he may try to hasten a diplomatic settlement of the matter. The Italian incident after nothing but bluff and bluster on the part of the Italian government, has blown over, and will cause secretary Blaine but little or no trouble in the future.

The contest for the Speakership of the next democratic house of representatives still attracts a great deal of attention here. It began last November, the day after election, as soon as it was known that the democrats would have such an overwhelming majority in the next House, and has continued in Washington and out of Washington ever since. Between Mills of Texas and Crisp of Georgia, the two leading Southern candidates, the contest waxes in intensity, as time runs on and the date for the meeting of congress approaches; although it is six months distant. Through their friends and friendly journals in Georgia and Texas and elsewhere, each of them is trying to strengthen his own and weaken his opponent's lines, when the caucus contest comes next December. Both of these candidates plume themselves on their tariff reform record and speeches in congress; but Mr. Mills has the advantage perhaps of prominence; having been chairman of the Ways and Means Committee when his party was in the majority in the House. Another candidate, however, who is likely to give both of these mentioned trouble, has lately begun to loom up as a formidable rival. This is Congressman McMillin of Tennessee. He is a pronounced candidate for Speaker, and no one doubts that he is thoroughly equiped and well qualified for the position. McMillin has been in congress for a dozen years. He can say much in a few words as any man in the House, is always ready for discussion on any topic, and in the parliamentary field he has no superior.

The recent railroad accidents on the Lake Shore road, by which seven postal clerks lost their lives; and on the Baltimore & Ohio road where two more were killed, has again called attention to the unenviable position of this class of postal employes, and causes considerable comment here on the lack of relief afforded by congress to the families of men who lose their lives in the service. When a railway mail clerk loses his life, his pay stops immediately under the existing law; but a postal clerk who is injured fares much better, as his salary continues while recuperating. Postmaster Generals for years have been urging on congress the passage of some sort of legislation for the relief of families of postal clerks who are killed; but congress has been deaf to all appeals for aid.

Stimulants for Pot Plants.

The successful florist has more faith in giving stimulants when the plants really need them then in keeping the roots buried in soil made rich and almost offensive by strong manure. When roots are few and the plants are almost at rest, the purer the soil and the less stimulant the plants receive, the better will they thrive when their roots come to draw up their supplies of nourishment.

Moisture is needed to soften the soil and to allow the roots to extract nourishment from it, but when all the virtue is out of the earth and the plants begin to show signs of distress, all the watering in the world will not give vigor to the exhausted functions, but let a portion of guano or any well prepared manure be mixed with the water sufficent to color it, and let this be repeated at every watering instead of giving a much stronger dose at longer intervals, the result will be most satisfactory. The beneficial results obtained from manure water when judiciously appeied to flowering and fruiting plants have long been recognized by cultivators, and its use is now becoming more general.

A valuable liquid is maide by using ammonia, putting about one teaspoonful to two quarts water when watering the plants.

Plants require about the same treatment except in the matter of food. Ivies may be given plenty of warm water but should not be stimulated with liquid manure.

Callas will bear stimulating to almost any degree. Give them an abundance stable manure and warm water. Commercial fertilizers are of no value in creating blossom stocks.

Give your pinks a little lime water, but never stimulate them with guano or anything of the sort.

Give roses a little powdered charcoal or weak soot tea. If flowers do not mature well, they may be made to by placing a layer of powdered charcoal half an inch deep on the earth in the pot. Commercial fertilizers or plant food should not be applied oftener than once in two weeks. Stir up the soil around the edge of the pot and in a small tablespoonful of the fertilizer, watering the soil slightly immediately after.

All stimulants should be applied with care. Begonias are particularly sensitive to them, and they should be used but seldom on geraniums; but to roses, fuchsias, carnations, heliotropes, and others they may be given with more safety.—American Rural Home.

Soap Bubble Party.

Soap bubble parties are beginning to be popular. They are found to be quite entertaining when given in the open air. The hostess provides each guest with a bowl of "suds" or soap solution, and pipes tied with gay colored ribbons, which souveniers of the occasion. Prizes are given for the largest bubbles, and if the party be given out of doors for the bubbles that go highest. Referees should appointed to make the awards. One method of entertaining at bubble party is to divide the company into two parties, all the pipes of each party trimmed alike, and the two factions contending for prizes. Or the gentleman's pipes may be provided with ribbons to match the ribbons of the ladies, thus separating the company into couples. Soap bubbles may be blown that will last for several hours by using a prepared solution, made in this way: Dissolve one part, by weight palm oil soap (the very best of castile is a fair substitute), cut in thin shavings, in 40 parts of rain water and fiter. Now mix one part of the filtered solution with two parts of pure glycerine at a temperature of about 68 degrees Fahrenheit, and after shaking them together in a large bottle, let the mixture settle for 48 hours. A clear liquid will settle on the bottom, and this should be sucked off with a siphon leaving the terbid liquid above. This terbid liquid may be filtered and used also. Bubbles blown with this solution are very tough and last a long time. Less glycerine may be used and for ordinary occasions perhaps half the quantity will suffice. Very large bubbles may be blown by using a glass funnel about two inches across the mouth or a lamp chimney instead of a pipe. The chimney should be well soaped around the lower edge to make bubbles cling well. If the bubble party is given on the lawn, as darkness draws on a pretty affect can be obtained by blowing bubbles with aluminating gas and touching them with a torch as they sail up. The best way to use the gas is to fill a rubber gas bag from a gas jet and carry it to the lawn, where the bubbles may be blown as wanted.

How to Make Coffee.

When the housewife hears her husband say in the morning, "How good the coffee smells," you may know that the aroma which makes it delicous has gone out through the kitchen window. The breakfast should always consist of a good cup of coffee and the simple thing of making coffee has to be done 365 times yearly in almost every family. Yet how few know how to do it, and fewer still know how to order it done. Breakfast is a meal which should be lightly partaken of, its very name implying the beaking of fast, so all such little things as coffee must be made nice and appetizing so as to tempt the dainty appetite of the morning. In buying your coffee get half government Java and half Mocha, and do not have it ground too fine. Next take one cup of this in a small bowl, pour over enough cold water to cover it; let it stand over night, covered with a damp cloth; stir in the morning an egg and shell, put this in your coffee pot and add three pints of boiling hot water. Let this simmer a few minutes on the stove, then set on the back of the stove in a pan of hot water to keep hot, and it is ready to use. Stuff a cloth in the spout of your coffee pot, the beautiful aroma which arises from it is what you must save. Before closing my little article on the cup of coffee let me say to every mother: Teach your daughters to cook, teach the child from infancy, when your are in the kitchen cooking and the child wants to help, always let her. Whether a girl marries or not, whether she expects to train a family or to become a great artist, or to be a house angel she should know how to prepare food. If you should ask me where should a girl learn to cook, I will say, in her home to be sure, under the care of her mother. Do I believe in cooking schools? Yes; and we ought to have more of them, so that persons can receive practial training in scientific and economical cooking. It takes brains patience, chemical knowledge, carefulness and taste in the work to learn to cook, and one may say it is one of the greatest arts of the present day to do it well, and after your daughters have learned and understand all the art of the cuisine she would not exchange its experience for the knowledge of any one language.—FRED MAY.

THE LOST CHILD.

SOME years ago, I was stopping at a little village on the Delaware, in one of the upper counties of New Jersey. Looking from my chamber window, early one morning, I observed an unusual commotion in the village—men, women, and children collected in groups at different points, and a.l seeming greatly excited, I hurried out to learn the cause, and was informed that a little girl of five years, the daughter of a widow living some two miles from the place, had been missing since about four o'clock of the previous afternoon, and it was supposed she had wandered off into an extensive wood, not far from the dwelling, and had got lost. The nearly distracted mother, with some of her nearest neighbors, had searched for her the day preceding as long as they could see, and during the night a messenger had arrived at the village with an appeal to the citizens to turn out en masse, and endeavor to recover the missing one, which many were preparing to do. I immediately resolved to make one of the number, and in less than half an hour was on my way to the wood with a party of friends, and where were soon collected not less than a hundred persons of both sexes, and some of them quite venerable.

After a general consultation, we divided into small parties, each taking a certain portion of the wood, and agreeing to meet upon the summit of a hill which was visible from our place of starting; but in case the child should be found before reaching the hill, a messenger was to be instantly despatched to the village, and have a six-pounder discharged, as a signal that success had crowned their efforts.

As the different parties were about to commence their search, each under the guidance of a neighbor living in the vicinity, my attention was called to a woman running across the fields and gesticulating wildly, and some one remarked that it was the almost frantic mother herself. We waited till she came up to us, and I do not think I ever saw more terrible grief depicted on human countenance than was expressed in her pallid face. She was in reality only thirty years of age, and naturally rather handsome; but the deep lines of grief and anxiety, now drawn on her expressive features, gave her the look of sixty. Her eyes, red from weeping, were wild and unsettled; her lips were ashy and quivering; her hair was dishevelled, and her dress was badly torn in different places, as if from rushing among bushes and brambles, with clasped hands and wild, hurried glances from one to another, she ran up to where I was standing, exclaiming in the most piteous, heart-touching tones: "Oh, for heaven's sake, find my child! My darling!—my sweet little innocent!"

"If possible, madam, we surely will," I answered.

"Oh, find her, sir, or I shall go mad!"

"Doubtless we shall find her before the day is over!" I rejoined; "but you must try and be calm, for this wild excitement will do you an injury."

"Calm!" she cried, with a look that was almost fierce; "who talks to me of being calm when my little Ada is wandering in unknown wilds, and dying of starvation? Oh, heavens! will no one find her and restore her to her mother's arms? But I will seek her myself! I will have her! She shall not be lost!"

Saying this, she started and ran into a thicket near at hand, regardless of tearing her clothes and lacerating her flesh with the brambles. Fearing she might lose her reason, and either do herself an injury, or wander off and get lost also, two gentlemen and myself immediately started after her. We had some difficulty in catching her, for she plunged through the bushes like a will beast. I took hold of her, using considerable force, and told her, in a stern, determined tone, that we should not permit her to act in such an unreasonable manner; and that if she wanted us to search for and find her child, she mnst be quiet, and permit herself to be wholly under the guidance of the ladies present. At first she was disposed to treat our advice with contempt, and declared, with a strange wild look, she would do as she pleased; but when she found we would not let her go unless she promised compliance with our request, she became more reasonable, and declared she would do anything if we would only set forward and find her darling child.

We now began our search in earnest, spreading out our party in a line, some ten or fifteen feet apart, and beating the bushes in our direct course. In some places the woods were very close and thick with underbush, and here our progress was always slow and tedious—for though we made a good deal of noise, and called the name of Ada at least once a minute, yet it was not certain the wanderer would answer. even should she hear us, being perhaps so bewildered and frightened as to shrink from her friends—and so, to make our work sure, we left not even the smallest hiding-place unsearched, but again, where the woods were open, we pushed forward pretty rapidly, and succeeded in reaching the summit of the hill mentioned, just as the setting sun was lighting it with his last golden rays. Some of the villagers were there before us, and the others came up soon after, and the meeting there was a serious one, as no one could give the least tidings of the missing child; and it was painful to think, not only of her forlorn condition and sufferings, but of the deep, mental agony of the poor, loving mother. So sincere was the sympathy of some of the villagers, that one man proposed to give a hundred dollars to whoever should find the child alive, and nine others quickly joined him, making the handsome sum of a thousand dollars reward, which it was rightly believed would prove a great stimulus to exertion on the part of many who might otherwise prove comparatively indifferent.

In fact, the news of the reward did fly rapidly, and the effect was almost magical. Several of those present who a minute before, were so tired from their day's work as scarcely to be able to drag their weary limbs home, now hurried off to get their supper, procure lanterns, and continue the search all night, while numbers at the village, who could not find it convenient that day to give their time to this work of humanity, now turned out with an eagerness that clearly showed how potent was the spell of money,

Not being in very good health myself, and wishing to husband my strength for the following day, I went home, and went to bed at an early hour. Though very much fatigued, I could not sleep for a long time, and moved restlessly to and fro, my mind filled with painful thoughts of the poor child dying of starvation in some lonely spot, and the poor mother shrieking away her reason over the horrible discovery. At length came a confused, half-conscious state, and then that peculiar condition in which we dream and know we dream, yet have no desire so wake. I thought I was out hunting the child, as I had been that day, and that besides the persons who had pursued the search with me, there was also a stranger, a man with a pale, ascetic face, and dressed not unlike a clergyman. Walking close up to me, and fixing his dark, expressive eyes intently upon me, he said, in a mild, pleasant tone, with a winning smile:—"You are troubled about this lost child, it does credit to your heart—and I have come to show you where she is."

"Oh, if you know, speak!" said I; "not because of myself, but for her sake, and her almost frantic mother's."

"Follow me!" returned the stranger, at once leading me away from all the rest.

Then I thought we were at the foot of the hill already more than once mentioned, at the very point where my companions and myself had begun its ascent and that instead of going up, as we had done, the stranger turned to the right, and led the way through a kind of swamp, till he came to a grassy meadow, through which flowed a sparkling rivulet. This he crossed, and continued on till he came to another hill, which was steep and rocky. Clambering up this hill, past rock after rock, we soon came to a ledge that was very difficult to ascent, and around the base of which the shrubbery was very dense. Turning into this thicket, and keeping around a hill we soon reached a point where the ascent to the top of the rocks was comparatively easy, and on coming to the summit of the ledge, there sat the poor little girl, crying and wringing her hands, and occasionally stopping to gaze with a shudder upon the dreary scene below.

At this point of my dream, I awoke; but the whole scene had been so real, that it was some time before I became convinced that I had been dreaming and had not seen the child at all; and even then I was so impressed with the idea that the vision was something more than a chance fancy, that I felt quite confident I should find her on the morrow.

At the first streak of day I arose, broke my fast, and started off in haste, telling my family of my dream, and that I really expected to find the lost one. A large number of the villagers set off at the same time as myself, and on our way to the wood we met nearly as many returning home from a fruitless night's labor, some of them completely worn down with a constant vigil and travel of four-and-twenty hours. To none of those going out or coming in, however, did I communicate my secret hope; but managing to separate myself from all, I repaired with all haste to the spot where the stranger of my dream had led me away from my companions.

To my great delight—I might almost say, surprise, though I confess I half-expected the result—I discovered the very swamp I had gone through in my sleep; and beyond it, too, the very same meadow and rivulet. My heart beat fast. Could it be, after all, that I had been directed by some higher intelligence? and that I was destined to save a sweet little life, and bring great joy to the almost breaking heart of a fond mother? I fervently prayed it might be so.

I hurried on, and still saw everything exactly as I had seen it in my dream. I came to the hill, ascended ft, and discovered the ledge. I was almost to the end of my journey! I should soon know! Hark! did I not hear a child's cry? My heart seemed to rise to my throat and choke me! Could the dream be a clairvoyant sight?

I plunged into the bushes, and ran around, up the hill, panting with exertion and excitemens. I gained the summit of the rocks, looking eagerly, almost wildly, at every object.

Ha! what was that? Something was before me, stretched out on the rock, like the form of a child! I bounded forward, and uttered a loud cry of joy!

Yes—the poor, sweet little girl was there her golden-haired head pillowed on her little white arm. At the sound of my voice she lifted a beautiful face, with a pair of soft blue eyes, and gave me a look I shall never forget. The next moment she was in my arms, strained to my heart, and I was weeping and thanking heaven.

"Mamma! mamma! take me to dear mamma!" murmured the poor, sweet little creature, in a feeble tone

"Yes, my poor, dear little innocent! Heaven bless you! I will take you to your dear mamma!" I answered in a choking voice.

The rest is soon told. I carried the child home a distance of five miles, for she was to weak to walk. Some one told the mother before I reached the house; and with a wild shgiek of joy she ran out to meet me; but fainted and fell, ere she could clasp her child, overcome by her emotions.

It was decided that I was entitled to the thousand-dollar reward. I accepted it, and then made a present of it to the poor widow, whose heartfelt blessings afforded me far more happiness than could be found in gold.

THE LADY AND THE BOBBY.

A Funny Scene and Quick Repartee in a St. Louis Street Car.

The cars on the Fourth street cable running east were almost deserted, when one with fewer passengers on board than any that had preceded it was passing Lafayette Park. It had almost reached the corner of Mississippi avenue when a young lady of attractive appearance and genuine refinement boarded it. She was evidently a young schoolma'am. She had reached the center of the platform and was facing the interior of the car where a pleasant faced officer of Hibernian extraction was seated, together with one or two other passengers. As she was about to step into the car it started with that sudden jerk peculiar to the Fourth street cable. She was of course thrown forward, and in trying to fall into a seat fell into the police officer's lap. Everyone in the car saw just how the accident had occurred and there was nearly a smile at the young lady's predicament. She, however, was not the kind to be overcome by an accident of this kind. By the time she was on her feet again she discovered the lace of her dress had become entangled on the brass buttons of the officer's uniform. The officer saw it at the same time, and while trying to disengage it, said: "Madame, I am attached to you." The young lady fully appreciated the situation and pertly answered: "Sir, the attachment is mutal." — St. Louis Republic.

The devil can't understand the stingy man, but he likes his ways,

When a man is mad the devil can make him believe anything,

"Don't say "Thy Kingdom come" with both hands in your pockets.

When you want a hard master work for a beggar who has just become rich.

When you want to see the Dead Sea in human form find a Christian who never gives.

God does not want a dollar from any man or woman who is not willing to be pure in heart.

It is astonishing how much you can find out about human nature by charging 10 cents admission.

No revival ever amounts to much where the preaching is not clear-cut against sin of every kind.

Whenever a man concludes that he has got enough religion it is a sure sign that he hasn't got any.

The man who has a kind word for everybody does more good than a surly one could do with money.

A good way to find out what kind of religion a man has is to notice what he does with his money.

There wouldn't be so many tired people in the world if men would stop climbing hills before they get to them.

If some men were as tender in heart as they are in the pocket what wonderful things they would do for the Lord.

The man who has the courage to stand up and face a lie when it is armed to the teeth is a man that angels never tire of looking at.

His "Brawses."

The American system of checking trunks is sometimes a puzzle to foreigners. An amusing story is told in the Chicago Tribune of a young Englishman who evidently understood one part of the subject—namely, that the checks must not be lost.

"Have me bawxes arrived?" he said to the hotel clerk.

"Hey?"

"Me bawxes."

"Eh! Oh, your trunks. Front, find the gentleman's trunks!"

They were not to be found, and their owner decided to go to the station for them himself.

"Have you me bawxes here?" he said to the agent.

"Huh?"

"Me bawxes."

"Trunks, d'ye mean? Let's see yer checks."

"Me checks! checks!" was the puzzled answer. "Bless me stars! Cawn't understand! I—"

"I want your trunk checks. Here, these things," explained the agent, showing a check.

"Oh, it's me brawses you want? I locked them in me bawxes. I'll have to get me bawxes first."

"Well, that beats my time!" ejaculated the baggageman. "Oh yes, certainly, I'll find 'em," and he did.

When a man throws away the strap around his pocket-book as soon as he joins church it is a pretty sure sign that he has religion.

WITTY AND HUMOROUS.

GEMS OF HUMOR FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.

A Mean Man--A Kentucky Breakfast-- He Was the Man--It Worked Both Ways--A Tender Conscience.

A Mean Man.

"Now, gentleman," said the man with the checked suit on, as he briskly entered the waiting-room, where more than twenty of us were sitting, "I have no time for foolishness. Life is short, and the man who expects to get there must hustle. I don't have much too say, but what I do say is straight up and down and good as the late Thomas Jefferson's affidavit. I have here a liquid compound of my own discovery. It is called 'The Fraud Detector,' and can be relied on every day in the week. Sunday included. One drop placed on a bogus diamond, a filled watch-case, or a roll-plate pin immediately exposes the cheat and protects you from imposition. Who takes the first bottle at twenty-five cents?"

"You've been swindled and imposed upon, and you hesitate to buy a good thing. There are at least fifteen watches and half a dozen so-called diamonds in this crowd. Who'll be the first to pass us a watch, pin, or ring and let me test it?"

"I'm waiting," remarked the man, as he stood before us.

Everybody looked at the opposite wall, and everybody wished he had that chap out in the woods for about three minutes,

"Oh, well," he continued, if you are all built that way of course I can't expect to make any sales here. I thought there might be one or two of you with some straight jewelry, but as there isn't and as I don't want to squeeze you too closely, I'll pass on."

It was a great relief to everybody when he walked out, and the nxet five minutes were spent in sly glances at ceach other. By and by I got up and walked out, stared at by all the others. I found the agent outside on a box laughing until he could hardly sit up.

"What kind of a guy is that?" I asked.

"Best in the world. That's simply a little cold coffee in the bottle, but it never fails to work. Try it from Maine to California and it always scares a crowd to death. Lands' but the whole convention of you turned whiter than snow—ha! ha! ha!"

And the man—the infernal wretch of a man—the hyena in human form—went off into such a fit of laughter that he fell off the box and rolled against a crate of cucumbers on their way to an early market.—N. Y. Sun.

A Kentucky Breakfast.

Never before had Chef Philips, of the Auditorium hotel in Chicago, been nonplused when asked to prepare a meal. From a cold lunch to a Lucullian banquet he had been at home. And the details of every conceivable dish he had imagined he possessed at his fingers' ends. But when on the morning following the arrival of Henry Watterson, the bell-boy, appeared before the chef and told him that Mr. Watterson wanted a Kentucky breakfast the chef was confronted with his Waterloo.

"What's that!" he exclaimed.

"A Kentucky breakfast," the bell-boy replied.

Not wishing co confess his ignorance to the bell-boy the chef waved him aside and went himself to the editor's room.

"Beg pardon, Mr. Watterson," he said, as in response to a "come in," he entered and found the journalist in bed, "but I fear the bell boy did not quite understand your order. He said you wanted a Kentucky breakfast."

"Well, that is just what I want," said the journalist, adding a little impatiently, "and I want it right away."

"What is a Kentucky breakfast, sir?"

Mr. Watterson gazed pityingly at the chef, then, settling down in bed, he pulled the clothes over his head and replied.

"Two drinks of whiskey and a chew of tobacco.'—New York Sun.

He Was the Man.

As a peddler of rugs was passing a house on Joy street a woman opened the door and called to him:

"You man, there—say."

He halted and looked at her and saw the grim determination in her eye.

"Ain't you the same young feller that sold me a rug las' spring?"

He was, but something in her voice made him forget to tell the truth.

"No'm, this is a new root for me. That mus' have been Soapy Jim. He's out of the bis'ness now."

"I reckoned it was you," persisted the woman; "think a spell. It was a red and yaller rug with a green border, and I paid for it once a week for two months. I do believe you're the same young feller."

"Is that so? Well, if you'd a been the same man I was goin' to buy another rug for myself and one for my sister who is going to Dakoty, and I wouldn't want to deal with a stranger. Excuse me for doubtin' your word, but you do favor that young man amazingly. I see now you ain't him."

She went in and shut the door, and he knew then that he had made the mistake of a lifetime.

He Wasn't a Liar.

President Board of Police Commissioners: We are sorry to say, O'Hoolahan, that you are discharged from the force.

O'Hoolahan: An' fer phawt cause, yer honor?

President: A jewelry store was burglarized in your district. Did you meet a man on your beat last night?

O'Hoolahan: Yis, your honor. I met a man an' he said, said he, he was going to open a jewelry sture.

President: He did open a jewelry store and stole $5000 worth of goods.

What Could He Expect.

They tell a good story of a certain gentleman who owns a number of houses. He recently let one to a young clerk, assuring him that it was in perfect order. A week later the young man rushed into the office and exclaimed:—

"See hear, I want to talk to you about that house."

"What's the matter?" demanded the owner.

"Water! Well, what do you expect? Champagne?"

Young Lady—"You are the Chief Head Center of the Pullers and Haulers Union in papa's factory, aren't you?"

Walking Delegate—"Yes, miss."

"Well, I'll give you a gold breastpin, a pair of diamond earrings, two nice rings, a lady's watch, and twenty-seven dollars, if you'll order the men to strike on the first of May,"

"Eh? What d'ye want us to strike for?"

"Because papa was too busy at the factory to take us to Europe last season, and I don't want him to have any such excuse this time."—Good News.

Very Fetching.

Young Wife: "Just to think, Harry, dear, my new hat blew into the street to-day and was run over by three waggons, four carts, and a tram-car."

Harry: "Humph! That means a new hat, of course."

Y. W.: "No, truly. It was rescued, and I took it to Mdme. Wayuppes, who was perfectly charmed. The waggons and things had mangled it into the most fashionable shape imaginable, and it is to be trimmed just as it is. You never saw anything so utterly fetching!"

A Tender Conscience.

Crossing Sweeper—"Please gimme two cents fer th' clean crossing."

Amused Pedestrian—"Why two cents?"

"You see, sir, I didn't clean th' crossing myself, but I licked the boy wot did, an' took his broom."

"You did, eh?"

"Yes sir. But I want ter do the square thing by 'im, an' if y'll gimme two cents I'll give him one."—Good News.

California Prices in 1849.

During the winter of 1849—50, the cost of living was extreme. As the season was a very wet one, the roads and trails were full of mudholes, in which supply wagons were stuck and mules and oxen mired. Wagons and animals were unloaded several times a day to extricate them from the mud, and in one instance at least fourteen days were spent on the road from Stockton, fifty miles away. Flour reached a dollar a pound, rice the same, pork, and bacon a dollar and sixty cents a pound, saleratus sixteen dollars a pound, and spermaceti candles a dollar each. An ounce of gold was the price of a pick or a shovel, and almost anything needed, except fresh beef, commanded a proportionate price. That all miners did not get rich is accounted for in the statement that it took a fair claim to pay expenses. The short duration of a placer claim, the loss of time in finding another, and too general restlessness, tell the story of many failures to realize a fortune by even those who were the most lucky. Too often it was due to extravagance, gambling, or the guzzling of brandy or whiskey at eight dollars a bottle. But drunk or sober one was obliged to pay two ounces for a pair of pantaloons, a hundred dollars for a pair of long-legged boots, and four dollars expressage for a letter—Pioneer Minning in California."

FOR RURAL READERS.

VALUABLE INFORMATION FOR THE FARMER.

Spinach-- Bumblefoot in Poultry-- Top-Dressing Pays--Profit in Live Stock--Expense of Evergreens.

Spinach.

As spinach lasts but a short time it is necessary to sow it frequently. It is so hardy that it may be put in the ground very early. It grows rapidly and is soon ready for use. The ground should be made very rich, and the seed put in drills one foot apart and an inch deep, though they do well when sown broadcast and covered a depth proportioned to their size.

The thick leaved and the large round leaved spinach are both good varieties for spinach planting. The New Zealand for summer, and the prickly seed for winter, the one withstanding drouth, and the other hardy. The former is much used in New Zealand and has become extensively cultivated as s kind of spinach elsewhere. The prickly has triangular, arrow-headed leaves. There is also a Savoy variety the wrinkled leaves resembling cabbage, and the Viroflay, which is perhaps the newest sort, with very large, thick leaves.

Spinach, though so unlike in appearance, is a near relative of the beet and the mangel wurtzel. Every year spinach seems to increase in popularity. The market gardener, of course prepares the ground and sows his seed in the fall. There is no reason why the farmer when he makes his garden in the spring should not have beds of spinach, as it requires little skill to cultivate it with success. It is well to give it a sheltered place, as it needs to grow rapidly to develop the succulent tenderness of the leaf. After the spinach is quickly and well grown it should not be spoiled in the cooking. The leaves may be pulled from the stalks, washed in cold water boiled 15 or 20 minutes, then drained quite dry in a colander chopped fine in a wooden bowl returned to the saucepan and well heated and seasoned, then dished in a hot dish and garnished with slices of hard boiled eggs. This is the simplest and one of the best ways of serving this early and very desirable vegetable, but it may also be prepared a'la creme, moulded or served on toast or with eggs.

Bumblefoot In Poultry.

Bumblefoot, or scaly leg, is due to the presence of very minute parasites which migrate from bird to bird, especially during the night at the roost-places. Soak the legs in warm water—as warm as the hand can stand it—and thereafter rub into the scaly parts a good coating of green or soft soap. Repeat this soaking and application every morning for a week. Then with the handle of a teaspoon carefully remove by degrees, day by day, more and more of the scales, but so that the foot is not wounded or in the least made raw. If necessary soak some more as at first. When thus as much as possible has been removed or that the leg has become reduced nearly to normal size, apply once a day during three successive days, a a thorough good coat of balsam of Peru, and eight days thereafter repeat this last remedy as before. The balsam should not be washed off. If after another eight days any undue soreness of the legs should be apparent, apply once daily so long as it may seem necessary, a coat of vaseline. During the treatment the birds should be kept from wet or muddy ground. The poultry house should be thoroughly scraped and cleaned out as well as the nest boxes. These latter, as well as the roosting poles should be treated with scalding hot water, and so should the floor, walls and ceiling of the poultry house. If this latter is not convenient or easily accomplished in a sufficiently thorough manner every nook, corner and crevice should be given a coat of hot lime wash. The dirt removed from the poultry house and the contents of the nest boxes should be carefully collected and burned. If the roosting poles are old and full of crack, it is best to put in new ones, which should first be given a coat of tar and dried. The floor of the poultry house as well as the nest boxes should be cleaned out at least once every week and some coal ashes dusted on the floor and into the nest boxes beneath a fresh wisp of straw.

Top-Dressing Pays.

It has been the custom with us to haul the cattle manure direct to the grass-lands as it is made, and the longer we follow the practice the more certain we are that in no other way can a farm be more rapidly improved. By no manipulation can manure be made richer in the elements of fertility than when first produced. Then why store it and risk the danger of waste from exhalations and leaching? By applying in its fresh coarse state we get all the plant nutrition there is in it, and in addition have the benefit of it as a protection to grass roots in winter, and a shelter from the scorching heat of summer. Year by year our fields increase their yield of corn and grass—other crops are of secondary importance with us in this dairying region. When we began the experiment we were almost alone in it, but gradually our neighbors have been adopting the system, and it invariably shows its advantage in the increased productiveness of the farms. I can not imagine a farm so poor that, by stocking it to its capacity and applying the manure to the surface as fast as made, it can not be rapidly increased in productiveness. I have seen very thin land, with apparently no grass on it, treated through winter with the manure from the stables, that by the next autumn was so heavily coated with white clover as to draw the attention of passers-by.—William T. Smedley.

Profit in Live Stock.

There are always farmers who will sell—perhaps must sell—calves, colts and yearlings. There's your chance. Go and buy and pay a fair price for the stock and keep it until 3 or 4 years old. Yes, if so inclined, you may include pigs and sheep.

In order to make money by this route your farm must be in condition, viz.: There must be plenty of pasture, meadow or hay, and the bins and cribs full of oats and corn. This necessitates that, with the intention of pursuing the course recommended, you must take a year to get ready, Ah, say you, that requires capital. Certainly. Do you know of any business which does not require capital? No other way than labor. That may be all the capital you have, and it may not be agreeable to invest that way. But, to return to our subject. I have never known a man who had good judgement of values, who studied the market reports, and who persistently followed the course indicated, but made money, and in the long run became rich.

There is still another condition, he must never be obliged to sell until his stock is in first class condition.

When you are ready to sell and your stock is in first-class shape, large, fat and handsome, keep the stock on your place and the buyers will come to you. First-class stock does not go begging; it will sell and for first-class prices, too, notwithstanding the syndicates or combines. The syndicate and other butchers have made contracts which must be met and sometimes the must will be for them to face. In such a case prices will go up and the boot will be on the other leg, if you are prepared.

Expense of Evergreens.

Expense is urged as an objection to raising evergreens. It might have been urged as such years ago, but the skill of propagating this class of trees has become great, and it is more generally known how to grow them from the seed. This has cheapened them and brought the planting of evergreens within the reach of everyone who has any hold on the soil. The price of a hundred ever-greens ten years ago will now buy a thousand. The younger they are bought the cheaper they are. All antiquated to the contrary notwithstanding, there is no easier, nicer, more satisfactory and inexpensive work than transplanting young evergreens. All cost in evergreens now is time and labor in transplanting and transportation if gotten from a distance, and the list of growers now show that these have been reduced to a minimum. At prices which growers offer them now anyone having any enthusiasm or inclination toward tree planting should not ignore evergreens.

Notes of the Dairy.

All milk should be strained immediately after it is drawn.

Pure cold water should be allowed in quantities limited only by the cow's capacity and desire to drink.

Milk is better for being kept over night in small quantities rather than a large quantity in one vessel.

In warm weather all milk should be cooled by the temperature of the atmosphere, after it has been aired, but not before.

The oils of the various kinds of grain fed to dairy cows have very much to do with the quality of the butter. Cottonseed, while giving an increased flow of milk, rich in butter fat, makes the butter greasy and sticky. Oats and bran give good oils for butter, but the best is the oil of corn. To the general use of corn in feeding dairy cows in the West is due to a great extent the fine flavor of Western butter.

Insect Poisons.

HELLEBORE.—The powder is sifted on alone or mixed one part to 20 of flour. With one gallon of water one-quarter pound is mixed for spraying.

PARIS GREEN.—With 20 pounds of flour from three-quarters to one pound is mixed and applied by sifting or by a blower. The same amount of the insecticide to 40 gallons of water is used as a spray.

LONDON PURPLE.—To 20 pounds of flour from one quarter to one-half pound is added and well-mixed. This is applied with a sifter or blower. With 40 gallons of water, ¼ to ½ pound is mixed for spraying.

CARBOLIC ACID.—A solution of one part in 100 of water is used against parasites on domestic animals and their barns and sheds; also on surface of plants and among the roots in the ground.

BISULPHIDE OF CARBON. For use in the ground a quantity is poured or injected among the roots which are being infected. Against insects damaging stored grain or museum material a small quantity is used in an air-tight vessel.

Farm Notes.

Early hatched chickens are the best for laying and for breeding; select the best and keep them.

There is much in knowing how to feed poultry to the best advantage as any stock on the farm.

Many farms will have no pigs and lambs as disturbing elements this season. In some cases a good reason is evident—the plague recently—for the first lack; and occasionally one is justified in barring out the lambs. Many general farmers are likely, as a result, to be "disturbed" also, in rounding up the year, to make income and outgo meet.

ALMOST A TRAGEDY.

Powerful Emotional Scene Enacted in a Club Room.

It was a club in which gaming for money was strictly prohibited.

A low murmur came from the richly tapestried apartment as the crouper (this isn't his right name), in a low monotonous tone said "Muggins!" every once in a while.

"I tell you," said Harold Sashingby, "that the tiddle-de-wink was moved at least a quarter of an inch."

"And I tell you boy that you are forgetting yourself!"

Quick as a flash Harold had drawn his trusty paper-cap pistol from his inside pocket, but with a quick movement Jack Seltzer disarmed him.

"Listen, rash boy!" he said. "You were a very powerful monocle, do you not?"

"I do,"

"And in making your play in tiddle-de-winks, which is essentially a game of skill, you shut one eye?"

"Of course."

"It is an easily demonstrated optical fact that an object when seen with one eye through a lens seems to have a very different size and relation to its surroundings from what it does when seen with the other eye naked."

Harold laid a three-cent piece on the chair, adjusted his monocle, and with great deliberation shut one eye and then the other.

Then without saying a word he threw open the window and discharged his papercap pistol harmlessly into the air.

In a very short time Harold Sashingby and Colonel Seltzer were partners in one of the most exciting games of parlor croquet that the club's history had ever known.—Washington Post.

Flourished 400 Years B. C.

W. S. Caine is writing some interesting letters from India for the Pall Mall Budget. In his last he thus speaks of an ancient ruin. We are now in the heart of the ancient city of Chaityagii, which flourished from 400 B. C. to 400 A. D., its greatest splendor being reached under King Asoka, about 250 B. C. Tradition says that it covered an area of 17 miles by 6. on the tongue of land formed by the junction of the Betwa and Bes rivers. Scattered over this area there are still left in more or less preservation, 65 individual examples of the remarkable architecture of the great Buddhist period of Indian history, of which the great tope of Sanchi is the finest; it is probably the work of Asoka, so far as its best architectural features are concerned. The tope itself is a huge dome of brick, faced with stone, slightly elliptical 106 feet in diameter and 42 feet high. This is placed on a circular platform, 120 feet in diameter and 14 feet high, which, surrounded by a sculptured rail, made a walk for worshipers all round the top. The beautiful rail lies in fragments at the base, and it is a pity the Government does not erect and restore it as far as possible. The entire tope is surrounded by another rail and four sculptured gateways; it is superbly placed on the leveled summit of a beautiful hill about 300 feet high. All round, on the wide table on which the tope is the center-piece, are monasteries, gateways, statues, temples and groups of huge monolithic square columns.

Nature's Nervine.

Dandelion is the coming nervine for women. More than one experienced physician tells of its use in cases of nervous depression and melancholy almost suicidal. Hysteria with indigestion is most successfully treated by dandelion alone, using a strong decotion of the roots. For school girls growing green and black with overstudy or bad circulation from any cause, for excitable women and those hysteric subjects who make their friend's lives a burden if not their own, the simplest remedy is a cup of strong dandelion coffee three times a day. But it must be strong and from the roots, fresh as possible, not the dried stuff sold as dandelion, which is half bread crumbs, and the other half any age with the life roasted out. No officinal prepartion compares with the decotion of herbs and roots fresh from the garden or well kept at first hand.—Shirley Dare's Letter.

A Strange Custom.

According to a Yorkshire (England) notion, a new born infant should always be placed in the arms of a maiden before it is touched by anyone else; and in some instances its right hand is bound in a cloth during the first day of its existance in order that it may gather riches when grown to manhood or womanhood estate. In many parts of the United States, Germany, France and Holland, as well as throughout the British Isles, it is considered very important that an infant should "go up" before it goes down in the world. Thus, if a child is born in the lower story of a house, it is instantly bundled up by one of the old women and carried upstairs: if the event occurs in the upper story the same old woman is expected to take the child in her arms and clamber upon the top of a table, bureau, or even a chair—anything to get the little one up in the world.—St. Louis Republic.

An Appalling Prospect.

Aunt Jessie—Kiss Mr. Happiman good morning, dear; you know be will soon be your uncle.

The Fiance—Good morning, little sweetness! Did you have pleasant dreams?

Florrie—No, sir. I dreamed there was a big locomotive a-shrieking right along side of me. An' then I waked up, and it was nothin' but Aunt Jessie snoring.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Artificial Gems.

Attempts have been made, not without success, to form minerals, Artificial ultramarine has long been an article of commerce. The formation of the diamond is said to have been actually effected, but in the opinion of the inventor the process is so difficult and so dangerous, that the diamond-miner and the diamond-merchant need not feel uneasy. The ruby and the sapphire have lately been reproduced in Paris, and curiously enough, the coloring matter in both is found to be due to one and the same metal—chrominum—in different states of combination. Red and blue stones, or an intermediate violet form which might be likened to the rare and beautiful oriental amethyst, have been obtained in one and the same operation, from the same lot of material. The jewels thus produced have so far all been small; large enough to form the pivots of superior watch works, but not large enough to rank as rare and costly ornamental objects. —Forum.

Our Would-be Aristocrats.

Thousands of American young men, of fair education and excellent possibilities, captivated by the pictures of English aristocratic life drawn in English novels, are learning to despise the simple, rational, useful life of the worthy American citizen, and to court consideration and vulgar popularity by adopting the habits, and leading the useless lives, of English lords. As is usual in such cases the copy is a caricature of the original. The untitled American lord proves usually to be a vulgar creature, having to assert his self-conferred lordship by all that is most unattractive, most inhumane, and most un-American—and that is a good deal—in the English aristocrat. In England, aristocracy has no need to display or to obtrude itself; in America it can exist only by display and obtrusion, for this reason the American would-be man must necessarily court attention and try to strike the vulgar imagination by the mere accidentals of aristocracy, such as any boorish Dives can command—houses, horses, turnouts, yachts, opera boxes, and the like. And the vulgar are impressed by such things, bow down in servile reverence before them, and do their best to make a similar display.—Forum.

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

Things are very serene and a calm quietude beams from the face of the people since the brainy legislature adjourned.

An editor in the western part of the county advises another to eat a whale. Suckers and bull-heads are much more pelntiful at this season of the year and especially in the vicinity of E. G. F.

The Red Lake pine will be sold this summer upon the portions which have been surveyed. It is not likely the reservation will be opened to settlers owning to the survey no being completed.

Pat Rahilly is giving his counterpart Donnelly a tight race as to which of the political things will receive the most newspapers notoriety. These two politicians have beeen traitors long enough to be discarded by all parties.

The policy of the republican party has ever been liberal with settlers on public domain, under the present managment the land department is working great injustice to many settlers by with-holding patents. Caused by a want of more clerical force.

Editor McKinzie takes us to task for inconsistency in stating that the farmers are down trodden and prosperous. When we say the farmers as a whole are poverty stricken we simply use a phrase of their dearest friends and use it figuratively. Look over the pages of your musty rhetoric Mc., and it well help out your comprehension.

Already do we hear the wisenere predicting the result of the next presidential. It will not be said during the the next campaign that the people had n't time to study the Mckindly bill. They however will be called upon to await the beautiful workings of reciprocity. In the mean time the democrat will have come to the conclusion that reciprocity is nothing more that free-trade with Latin American.

And so Mr.—— ——doesn't like some of the things he reads in this newspaper? Neither do we. But he is at liberty to pick out what he doesn't like and leave the rest for some one who is less fastidious. Does he know what they call the man who sat down at a first class hotel dinner and beginning at the first item on the bill of fare tried to eat every dish mentioned there on? This newspaper presents a varied bill of fair every week, but there is no law compellng you to devour every portion of it. Just put aside what you don't relish and say nothing about it. And don't swear at the edito. It's both wicked and foolisn.—Exchange

Monday morning fire caught in Dr. Lemieux' house and was making rapid progress when discovered. The fire caught from a pipe running through a wall and was burning the scantling and lath. A number of citizens came to the rescue and after tearing large rents in four walls, succeeded in getting enough water in to extinguish the flames—not, however, till damages to the amount of fifty dollars had been done.

Did you ever pause to reflect that you are a nuisance of the first water? Do you know that the neighbor from whom you borrowed this paper you are now reading is often greatly inconvenienced by you? He subscribes and pays for the paper for his own individual use and benefit, it is not done for your pleasure, edication or comfort. He may not tell you so to your face, because the class of men who subscribe and pay for the newspaper are good, kind hearted fellows; but they do a good deal of thinking all the same when you ask for their newspaper. Stop borrowing and you will stop making a nuisance of yourself.

WAS AFTER GOLD.

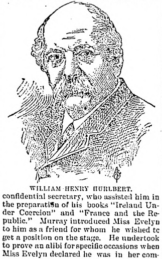
Gladys Evelyn's Suit Against William Henry Hurlbert.

ALLEGED BREACH OF PROMISE.

Disproval of the Scandalous Charges Brought Against the Ex-Owner of the New York World by a London Adventuress—Hurlbert's Career.

The literary and political circles of London were recently stirred to their centers by a breach of promise case in which an actress named Gladys Evelyn was the plaintiff and Mr. William Henry Hurlbert, formerly editor and proprietor of the New York World, the defendant. The hearing of the suit occupied several days, and the evidence was of a decidedly sensational character. According to the story of Miss Evelyn, who is a fine looking, buxom woman of some thirty years, she met Mr. Hurlbert in an omnibus, and they immediately began a silent flirtation. Her heart was in a wild flutter of excitement when she alighted from the vehicle and discovered that her "unknown Faust" was following her. She felt that she would really like to know the gentleman, and that feeling overcame her scruples and induced her to go through the ceremony of self introduction on his part. After the ice was broken in this fashion "betrayal" followed. Mr. Hurlbert promised marriage, but after repeated evasions confessed that the name of Wilfred Murray, which he is said to have assumed during the intrigue, was false, and that he was a married man. Then, by way of reparation, he promised her $4,000 cash and $750 a year for life. This money was not forthcoming, however, and on discovering the real name of her betrayer she brought this suit for damages.

In defense Mr. Hurlbert entered a complete denial, and charged the plaintiff with a gross and wicked attempt at blackmail. It was utterly untrue, he declared, that he had ever passed under any other name than his own. Formerly, however, he employed a person named Wilfred Murray as his confidential secretary, who assisted him in the preparation of his books "Ireland Under Coercion" and "France and the Republic." Murray introduced Miss Evelyn to him as a friend for whom he wished to get a position on the stage. He undertook to prove an alibi for specific occasions when Miss Evelyn declared he was in her company. Murray's handwriting was similar to his own, and he intimated that certain letters which the plaintiff said were written by him, and which the attorney general who defended the well known journalist said if he really wrote them he "was the vilest and most debased wretch who ever lived," were forged by Murray. A great deal of testimony was admitted to show the easy virtue of the plaintiff, who acknowledged certain irregularities in her life prior to her acquaintance with Mr. Hurlbert. The jury concluded that her case was not proven and rendered a verdict of acquittal on the ground that there had been no offer of marriage.



WILLIAM HENRY HURLBERT.

Mr. Hurlbert, who has lived in Europe since 1883, when Mr. Pulitzer bought the New York World, was for twenty-five years one of the brightest, most prolific and best known writers for the metropolitan press. He is the son of a Unitarian clergyman in Charleston, S. C., and his mother was a Randolph of New Jersey. He was born in the summer of 1827 and educated at Harvard, graduating with the class of 1847. He then entered the divinity school and staid two years. For the next three years he had charge of a Unitarian church in Rhode Island. During this time he wrote several very beautiful hymns, some of which are still in the song books used by the Unitarians. In 1855 he went to New York and began writing for Putnam's Magazine. His ability was acknowledged at once, and Mr. Raymond gave him the place of chief editorial writer on the New York Times.

It was while he was in this position that there appeared in the editorial page of the New York Times that famous editorial called "The Elbows of the Mincio." Mr. Hurlbert was in charge of the paper for the time being, and had had some words with the head proofreader. The proofreader was admonished to follow Mr. Hurlbert's copy exactly, and never to take any liberties with it under pain of dismissal. In the afternoon Mr. Hurlbert wrote several pages of an article about some diplomatic feature of the Crimean war. He went to dinner, and upon returning appeared to have forgotten about his incomplete article and started another on some social topic. In sending his copy to the composing room the two articles got mixed. The proofreader followed instructions exactly, and there appeared in the next day's paper the most remarkable editorial on record.

In 1864 Mr. Hurlbert bought The Commercial Advertiser, but he and his associates did not get along smoothly, so it was sold to Thurlow Weed.

In 1876, with the assistance of Colonel Thomas Scott, of the Pennsylvania railroad, he bought The World from Mr. Marble and controlled it for seven years. Mr. Hurlbert always had the faculty of getting on the unpopular side of every question of moment. He really despised public opinion, and therefore he was poorly fitted to edit a Democratic newspaper. As a business man Mr. Hurlbert was a curiosity. He seemed to have no comprehension of commercial methods, and while the paper was under his control his publishers had a hard time indeed.

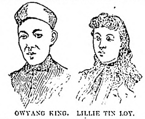
In 1884 Hurlbert had diplomatic aspirations. He asked Mr. Cleveland to appoint him minister to Rome. Mr. Cleveland declined, and Mr. Hurlbert was very indignant. This broke up the lifelong friendship between Secretary Bayard and Hurlbert, and Hurlbert has generally been credited with having written the famous Arthur Richmond letters about Mr. Bayard in The North American Review.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

The Reasons for a Chinese Girl's Temporary Seclusion.

Lillie Tin Loy is the daughter of a Chinese merchant of Grass Valley, Cal. She was recently taken to San Francisco by her friends, and placed in solitary confinement in a room at the house of Lee Hung San. For five days and nights she saw no one but those who brought her food and drink.

On the evening of the fifth day her attendants dressed her in a dark blue robe, and, enveloping her in the folds of a heavy red veil reaching to her feet, led her from the house to the residence of Owyang King, the Chinese consul. The building was gayly illuminated with lanterns, and in the middle of the walk leading to the door a small bonfire of scented woods was burning. Lillie, over whose head was held a gorgeous umbrella, was carried through the burning embers, and a loud explosion of firecrackers followed. She was then conducted to a richly decked chamber and again left alone.



OWYANG KING. LILLIE TIN LOY.

At that time Owyang King was feasting in the most extravagant style with city merchants at a neighboring restaurant. A messenger interrupted the festivities, and told him he was wanted at the consulate on business of importance.

Mr. King left the feast immediately, accompanied by several friends. At the door of the consulate he was met by five friends of the Tin Loy family, who conducted him with great ceremony to the room where Lillie sat veiled. She was now supported by four married women. Mr. King approached the young lady and raised her veil. Then a written contract was read, and Mr. King and Miss Tin Loy were told that their friends had decreed they should become man and wife. Neither seemed to be taken by surprise, however, and they pledged their troth in wine, served in silver tankards connected by a piece of red ribbon.

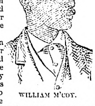
This is the first official Chinese wedding in the United States, and it was conducted as related, in strict accordance with old time customs of the Celestial empire. The bride is a well educated young lady and an accomplished musician and artist. Owyang King is thirty-one years old and a graduate of Yale. He was assigned to the consulate of New York in 1883, and went to San Francisco as vice consul in 1886. He holds fourth rank in the service.

MISS MAGRUDER'S HORRIBLE DEATH.

Her Skull Beaten in with Stones—Peril of a Suspected Man.

The colored population of Kansas City, Mo., was recently wildly excited by the discovery of the body of Mollie Magruder, a negro washerwoman, with the head beaten into a pulpy mass. She lay on her back near the Priests of Pallas hall, her arms extended, and on the ground nearby were three small jagged fragments of limestone stained with blood, which the murderer had evidently used in his terrible work. Over the right eye was a great ragged hole, from which the brains had spattered into her hair and over the ground.

She had made a desperate fight for life. The ground about where she lay was heavily trampled, and bits of grass clung to her dress. The forefinger of her left hand was nearly cut off. Suspicion was at once directed to William McCoy, a colored man, who lived with the murdered woman. Blood spots were found on his coat sleeves and hat, and a knife and pipe found near the body were identified as his.

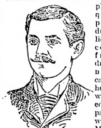


WILLIAM M'COY.

McCoy took his arrest very coolly and stoutly denied the crime. Three days after his arrest an infuriated mob of colored people attacked the jail at night with a view to lynching the fellow. They wore masks, were fully armed and had a rope already knotted with which to hang him. They gained admission to the jail, but were met by Captain Malloy, the jailer, who answered a demand for the keys with several shots from his revolver. The mob fell back, and as the captain was re-enforced by several deputies who showed a determined front, quickly left the building. They fired several shots after leaving the jail, but no one was injured and no arrests were made.

Slipped Out of the Soap Business.

W. A. Gordon, a toilet soap and fine candy merchant of New Orleans, is mourning the absence of a trusted clerk named F. J. Isbert who collected $500 due his employer and then quietly disappeared. Isbert's duties were to solicit orders and collect accounts from the retail druggists. He was not a successful canvasser, but as he went to the firm well recommended, and was apparently a trustworthy fellow, Mr. Gordon paid him a good salary and placed implicit confidence in his reports of sales and receipts. His absence from the store several days in succession led to an investigation, when it was discovered that he had been doctoring his accounts and appropriating sums aggregating $500 to his own use. Isbert is believed to be hiding in Texas.



F. J. ISBERT.

Captured a Rattlesnake.

If Miss Leonora Dedge is a fair sample, it is to be assumed that the North Carolina girl is not afraid of reptiles. Leonora, who is thirteen years old and the daughter of Captain J. G. Dedge, a well known farmer of Appling county, rode out to the woods the other day to drive up the cattle, and came upon a very large rattlesnake. She dismounted from her saddle, hitched her horse, and chased the snake to a root, trying to kill him, but the snake succeeded in reaching a den under the root. She then remounted and galloped her horse home, but soon returned with implements sufficient to force the snake from its den. Then she put a rope round its neck and dragged it home, where she now has it in a cage.

THE latest Kentucky bride is scarcely to be congratulated on her wedding. All the guests were poisoned at the wedding banquet, and, to cap the climax, she married a man named Snooks.

GEN. GRANT loved Phil Sheridan, not only as a comrade but even as if he were his own son, and when he desired to render a rare compliment to his beloved Sheridan, he said: "Sheridan is a great general; greater than von Moltke."

THE generals of our civil war are getting scarce and when such a trio of these as Butler, Banks and Sickles stand up together on the same platform and give the people a chance to shake hands with them, it is a privilege to be appreciated.

COUNT LOWENHAUPT, who married Miss Bayard a few months ago and who died shortly afterward, is said to have been killed by overwork. This statement may add to his reputation as a man and an adopted American citizen, but it tends to discredit his claim to the title of nobility.

COUNT TOLSTOI not long ago discovered that marriage was a sin, now he declares that all the ills of life come from tobacco. The Russian should stick to his novel-writing. He is not a success as a moralist. He finds all his grand moral truths in his own individual likes and dislikes.

A MICHIGAN editor declares that he would rather be the editor of a country paper and trust in the Lord for a living than to be president of a railroad with an annual pass and $10,000 a year. And yet men tell us there is no such thing as contentment in this workaday world!

IT is apparently not much known at large that Parnell has a brother, John H., living in West Point, Ga. It is surmised that his brother will be wanted by the warlike leader to stand for election to Parliament from one of the Irish constituencies before the next general election.

LONDON is greatly stirred just now by a reform movement in dress which, the cable informs us, "consists of brevity of skirt, quality of underdress, and shortness of upper drapery." And this the London reformers call the "rational dress." In America it is known as the ballet-dancer's costume.

MR. PENNINGTON has been heard from again. He says there is but one trifling hindrance to the success of his air ship and that will shortly be overcome. He does not specify the hindrance but it is probably the one that prevents a man from lifting himself by his boot straps.

THE chief feature of importance developed in the Chillian rebellion is the success of the torpedo in naval warfare. Heretofore its existence has rested upon theory only. Now we all know it is a strong argument against the construction of huge war ships, as the bigger they are the sooner they will reach Davy Jones' locker with all on board when a torpedo gets under them.

NEW JERSEY, which is particularly well situated for collecting taxes on railroad property, assessed a total tax of $1,349,082 in 1890. This is at the rate of nearly $700 a mile on main lines, or $350 a mile on all tracks, including sidings. The beauty of it, from a New Jersey standpoint, is that the travellers and shippers who ultimately pay such taxes are for the most part citizens of other States.

WHILE the late Prince Sanjo, of Japan, Keeper of the Great Seal, lay on his deathbed, the Emperor came to him, read an address recognizing the dying noble's splendid services, and raising his faithful friend to the highest rank to which it was possible to elevate him. Prince Sanjo, who had been unable to move a muscle for some time, thereupon raised his head and folded his hands in the Japanese fashion to show his gratitude. He then became unconscious and died the same evening.

Senator Isaac is opposed to the idea of the United States acquiring the mole of St. Nicholas as a coaling station, as the possession of this place by the American government, he claims, would menace the independence of the Antilles.

AT an adjourned meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, held in London, the policy of Sir Henry W. Tyler, president of the company, was confirmed and the old board of directors was re-elected.

THE joint committee of the Trunk Line association met in New York. No business of vital importance was transacted. The impression prevails that unless the boycott of the Alton by the Trunk lines is declared off the worst rate war of years will result.

IT is a fact not generally known that the special train which recently carried Van Horne and party westward over the Canadian Pacific made the last hundred miles at the rate of one mile per minute. A great landslide in the Selkirk impeded the progress through the mountains and delayed passenger trains two days.

THE Great Northern track is completed and ballasted from Whatcome, Wash., to Westminster, but regular trains do not run further north than Blaine, because of a law which prohibits regular traffic on Canadian railroads until supplied with telegraph lines along the route to prevent the possibility of accidents. It will be late in May, therefore, before trains will run across the boundary of the Fraser river.

MORE BLOOD IS SHED

Another of the Strikers in the Coke Region Killed by Mine Officials.

The Men Charged With the Killing are Arrested and Placed in Jail.

SCOTTDALE, Pa., May 6.—The coke region to-day was shaken from center to circumference by just such another scene as has been feared for weeks since the dreaded Morewood killing. At Leisenring No. 3 last night a man named Mahan was shot dead and another seriously injured.

Two Hungarians, who had left the works, delayed their visit and Supt. Gray became suspicious. He, in company with his assistants and four deputy sheriffs, visited House No. 17, where their workmen were enjoying themselves immensely. Their entrance caused a stampede among the strikers, and two of them rushed out.

Mr. Gray and the deputies were followed to the hill by the angry crowd, who came so close they were compelled to back down with rifles presented. They staved off the mob as long as possible, but Mahan rushed up to one of the deputies, seizing his rifle, and grappled with him. This deputy fired and the balance followed suit. In the fusilade the man fell dead, while another was injured. There are grave apprehensions of further trouble at Leisenring, and the force of deputies is largely increased.

Deputy Coroner Stone arrived at Leisenring, empaneled a jury and conducted the examination. A verdict was rendered that Mahan came to his death from gunshot wounds fired by an unknown person.

On information of Worthy Foreman McSloy, of the mine workers, Supt. Gray, Mine Boss Callaghan and Yard Boss Agnew were arrested for murder and given a preliminary hearing before Squire Cotton of Dunbar, who held the defendants for trial. They were taken to jail. The testimony adduced placed the blame of the shooting on Gray.

Some thirty families were evicted to-day at Bradford, and more would have been thrown out had not the deputies objected to being stoned and struck because they were not allowed to use their revolvers on the strikers.

To-night there are 3,500 men at work, including the men at Independent works and T. W. Rainey's.

There is no doubt a slow but steady gain is being made on the men, owing to heavy imports of labor. Five car loads of Italians arrived in the region to-day.

LEAVING CALIFORNIA.

The President and Party on Their Way to Oregon.

HORNBROOK, Cal., May 6.—President Harrison and party arrived at Red Bluff, Cal., at 8:30 o'clock this morning on their way to Oregon and had a cordial reception.

At Redding, Cal., the train made a stop of twenty minutes, during which time the president made a few remarks. Postmaster General Wanamaker made a short speech, in which he said that of all the states the party had visited he thought California was the most glorious. Secretary Rusk was also presented, and said that while Mr. Wanamaker had postoffices in his pockets for every town and cross roads, he did not have what we have here—prosperity with plenty to eat. He also remarked that he regretted being compelled to leave California, and would like to live here always. After Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. McKee had been introduced the train drew out amid the cheers of the 2,000 people assembled.

The presidential party passed through Delta about noon, and at Dunsmuir the president shook hands with a large number of old soldiers and thanked the citizens for their reception.

Intermittent showers of rain marked the passage of the presidential train through the Shasta valley, and the president and ladies were much disappointed at not being able to see the summit of Mount Shasta. Thick clouds obscured the mountains in the valley, and when Mount Shasta station was reached heavy rain was falling. Previous to reaching that place stops had been made at Dunsmuir, where the crowd cheered the president, and at Mount Shasta, Soda Springs, where the party drank some of the mineral water. The people at Mount Shasta had a brass band and plenty of enthusiasm ready, and the president and Messrs. Wanamaker and Rusk briefly addressed them. A large framed photograph of Mount Shasta and specimens of the lava were presented to the president.

Another brass band and large crowd were gathered at Montague, where the president made a short address. The train passed through Hornbrook at 5:15 p. m., and an anvil salute was fired in the president's honor.

MARKED FOR ASSASSINATION.

A St. Louis Italian Thinks He Has Been Doomed by the Mafia.

ST. LOUIS, May 6.—Tony Pandolfin, an Italian, well educated and of good address, believes that he is a marked man—marked for assassination by the deadly Mafia—and for that reason he goes about his business heavily armed.

The case has just been reported to the police, but the story told is that while Pandolfin was standing in a saloon at Seventh and Elm street yesterday he was attacked by an unknown Italian and stabbed in the left breast.

"I am positive that I have been marked for assassination," he said. "As I was leaning against the bar yesterday I saw a hand stretched over my shoulder and the gleam of a long-bladed dirk in the clenched fingers, and then felt the steel in my breast."

As he said this he pushed back his shirt and displayed a small red line in the middle of his left breast. Pandolfin attributes the attack to a remark he made in a crowded saloon at the time of the New Orleans lynching. He was discussing the affair with some friends, and said that it served the "d—d dogs right," and he believes that the Mafia has sent an emissary to do away with him.

Defiant Moonshiners.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., May 6. — United States officers returned here to-night from a raid on moonshiners in the southern range of the Ozark mountains upon White river. Beside capturing Sam Poole and Mat Jackson, with three confederates, constituting part of a notorious gang of illicit distillers and blockade runners, the officers report discovering a large plant with a capacity or one hundred gallons per day, and members of the gang are defiant and assert they will not be taken. The United States officers will make another and final raid in the latter part of this week. They have nine warrants not yet executed, and serious trouble is feared.

WANTS HIS WEALTH.

Suit Brought by a Woman Against a Northern Minnesota Speculator.

CHICAGO, Special Telegram, May 6.—Mrs. Lillian B. Louthan wants $15,000 now wrapped up in the bank roll of John F. Winchester, a heavy speculator in Northern Minnesota, and said to own $200,000 worth of property in that vicinity.

The suit was begun in the circuit court last Saturday, but was suppressed until today. The suit is for alleged slander and alienation of affections.

Mrs. Louthan is a married woman and lives in Englewood. She is thirty-five years of age, and her attorney says she is "as pretty as a picture." Mr. and Mrs. Louthan, according to the lawyer, were living near St. Paul when Winchester became a member of their family. The story of the suit began two years ago. Winchester was obliged to go a distance of fifteen miles and hired a sleigh. Louthan requested the speculator to give Mrs. Louthan a ride. He did so, and shortly after their return Winchester is reported as having informed the husband that he had taken advantage of his wife. Without a word of explanation Louthan left his wife, and they have since been separted.

A short time ago Louthan asked his wife to return and she refused unless he told her why he left her. He did so, and this suit is the result. Mrs. Louthan denied that she ever misbehaved with Winchester. She says he offered her $3,000 to part from her husband and she declined to listen to the proposition. In other ways, also, it is alleged. Winchester has sought to separate the couple, and the damages are claimed for his various attempts.

MYSTERIOUS VESSELS.

Two Ships From Chili Eyeing Each Other in American Waters.

SAN DIEGO, Cal., May 6.—The Chillian steamer Etata, which came into harbor yesterday, is still here taking in a large amount of coal and supplies, and despite the fact that her captain claims that the vessel is only a passenger steamer owned by a New York firm, opinion is growing here that she is a transport and is after arms and ammunition for Chilian insurgents, and as soon as she is loaded here, will take on board the cargo of schooner Robert and Minnie, now lying at the Santa Catalina island, supposed to be loaded with ammunition of war.

A big Chilian war vessel is also reported outside the harbor to-day, apparently awaiting the appearance of the Etata.

There are about ninety men aboard the Etata, and they all refuse to talk of their movements and destination. The large amount of supplies which the Etata took on board to-day, including 40 live cattle, 3,000 pounds of dressed meat and 800 tons of coal, is not regarded here as bearing out the captain's statement that the Etata was bound for Nauamino to load with coal.

The Mexican man-of-war Democrata is also in the harbor, and it is supposed she was attracted here by the report that the schooner at Catalina is a filibustering craft, and that she would call outside the harbor bar of San Diego for a contingent of Lower California invaders. It is said the Democrata will watch both mysterious vessels.

SUGAR FROM BEETS.

An Immense Plant Located at Marshalltown, Iowa.

MARSHALLTOWN, Iowa, Special, May 6.—This city is fairly wild with enthusiasm today, occasioned by the fact that a mammoth beet sugar plant is assured. Eastern capitalists made a proposition to our people a short time ago that if they would subscribe for $50,000 worth of stock and donate forty acres of land for the plant they would establish a factory here with a paid up capital of $550,000. A citizens' committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions and today it reports the full amount raised. An agent of the company has been here several days and to-day the negotiations were closed, so that the industry is an assured fact.

Eight tons of sugar beet seed and the necessary implements for drilling and culture have been ordered by telegraph and active operations will begin at once, as it is the intention to have the factory in running order by the first of next November.

The capacity is to be 400 tons of beets or 80,000 pounds of sugar per day, and the projectors say it will be one of the largest factories of the kind in the world. This enterprise will afford a great stimulus to our industrial and commercial business, and everybody is enthused over the prospects.

SHUT UP IN A BURNING HOUSE.

Five Children Perish in the Flames While Asleep.

UPPER MARLBORO, Md., May 5.—Saturday night the house of James Cole (colored) was burned in Prince George's county, and his five children perished in the flames.

The house was on the farm of Robert Connyek, in Aquasco district. The father went from his home to visit a neighbor, leaving the house in charge of the children—four girls and one boy—whose ages ranged from five to fifteen years. Shortly afterward he discovered that the house was on fire, and that the youthful inmates, who had gone to bed, were unable to escape. Assisted by Mr. T. M. Naylor and his brother an attempt was made to rescue the unfortunate children, but without success. They were all burned up with the house.

Ex-Bankers in the Toils.

PHILADELPHIA, May 6.—Gideon W. Marsh, who was president of the Keystone National bank at the time of its suspension in March last, and Charles Lawrence, ex-cashier of the bank, were arrested to-day charged by Bank Examiner Drew with conspiring together to make false reports of the condition of the bank to Controller of the Currency Lacy by means of false entries in the banks books. The two ex-officials were held in $20,000 bail each for a further hearing. In his testimony before the United States commissioner Bank Examiner Drew testified that the estate of John C. Lucas, deceased, former president of the bank, was credited on the books with an indebtedness of $750,000 to the bank, whereas the full indebtedness of the estate of Mr. Lucas had been about $900,000, of which amount about $700,000 had been returned.

Grip Causes Spotted Fever.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, May 6.—According to Health Officer Ashman, there are many indictions that the grip will be followed by many cases of cerebro spinal meningitis, which is sometimes called "spotted fever." There have been at least a dozen deaths from the disease during the past two weeks, and Dr. Ashman finds that the grip was the primary cause of all of them. This disease, which attacks the membranes of the brain, soon throws the patient into horrible convulsions. This new form taken by the grip epidemic is regarded as very startling by Dr. Ashman, and worthy of immediate attention by the medical and civil authorities.

A MINISTRY SHAKEN

The Massacre Was all But Unprovoked and the Troops Displayed Wanton Inhumanity.

PARIS, May 5.—The details of the labor trouble at Fourmies immensely heightened the political importance of the incident. The fact that six women, several children and eight men were killed on the spot, while twenty were wounded, several fatally, gives the affair the character of a massacre. The soldiers were merely exposed to stone-throwing, but they replied with successive volleys from their new Lebel rifles, inflicting frightful wounds on their victims. The houses exposed to the fire were riddled, and there is every sign that reckless and wanton inhumanity was shown by the troops. The local popular commotion is intense, and it finds a response in the growing excitement in every working center.

Fourmies to-night is practically in a state of siege. Cavalry patrol the streets, and are everywhere greeted with yells of reprobation from excited groups of men and women. The tension of feeling may be judged from the fact that the military are hailed with cries of "Vive Prussia." The funeral of the victims was fixed for to-day, but the enormous number of workingmen arriving from other industrial centers caused the government to send for reinforcements and to order the postponement of the funeral until to-morrow.

The prefect to-day refused to receive a deputation asking for the removal of the regiment that fired upon the crowd. A section of the Left, and the Socialist and Boulangist deputies join in demanding a vote of censure against H. Constans, minister of the interior, as responsible for the slaughter. A motion to that effect will be made in the chamber of deputies to-morrow. A majority of the Right and Left approves generally the measures of repression taken by M. Constans throughout the country, but will advocate an inquiry into the conduct of the troops at Fourmies.

Parliamentary circles view the affair as shaking the position of the ministry. Labor centers throughout France are profoundly moved and public meetings here, at Marseilles, Lyons and elsewhere are being organized to protest against the precipitate action of the authorities.

It is learned that the subprefect of Fourmies ordered the firing on the crowd. It would have been still worse had not the mayor risked his life and rushed between the combatants and implored them to stop fighting. This is the first time that the Lebel rifle has been used against human beings.

The commander at Fourmies, Cacarrie, in a report to the minister of war on the May day troubles, assumes full responsibility for the action of the troops: He says he only ordered firing when the troops were in danger of being killed or disarmed, after thrice summoning the mob to disperse.

BLAZING WOODS.

Further Information Concerning the Forest Fires in the East.

ERIE, Pa., May 5.—Forest fires are still raging with great severity along the line of the Philadelphia & Erie railroad, and it is almost impossible for the trainmen to endure the suffocating smoke in some parts of the mountain passes.

In the vicinity of Clarendon great trouble is experienced in keeping the fire away from the town. At Sheffield the owners of oil derricks are fighting the fires, and so far have managed to save everything except one or two rigs. At Ludlow the mountains are full of fire. At Wilcox the fires are running up one side of the mountain and down the other. Around Johnsonburg and Ridgway the fires are raging furiously, but the timber and low mountain growth does not come in close to the towns and they are not in imminent danger.

Down on the middle division of the Philadelphia & Erie railroad the mountains are full of fire; and, while it is very disagreeable traveling the mountain, they are a wierd and grand sight at night. Game, including deer, are chased in herds into the small lumbering towns.

A Kentucky Town Has Anything but a Pleasant Experience.

The first work of destruction by the tornado was the unroofing of the Newport News Mississippi Valley railroad freight depot. After this the tornado cut a zigzag track through the city. The roof of the colored people's school house was torn off as was that of the freight office of the Paducah, Tennessee & Alabama railroad freight depot. The Third Street Methodist church was picked up and dropped into the middle of the street, a confused mass of debris. One hundred buildings were damaged. Several people were injured. His honor says that in order to secure payment for this work under the $100 limit the mayor charges that Dunck did "falsely, fraudulently and deceitfully cause all bills to be made for a less amount than $100."

ROUGH ON THE OLD MAN.

By Losing His Bet He Saved the Life of the Countess in the Story.

Aime Millet, the French sculptor who died a few weeks ago, was in the habitue of the Divan Lepelletier a Bohemian Club in Paris frequented by artists, authors, and newspaper men. His best friend in the club was Paul Duplessis, the novelist, who long edited the feuilleton in the Patrie. The two men had a standing engagement to meet at the club every evening shortly before dinner. One evening when Duplessis was late Millet strode impatiently up and down the reception room, striking his hands before and behind him, and eagerly eyeing his watch every five minutes. Finally Duplessis arrived forty-five minutes late, Millet sprang to him and caught him by both shoulders.

"What's the matter?" ejaculated the novelist.

"A question," answered Millet. "My father reads your serial novel in Patrie with tremendous care and interest. Yesterday you left the Countess in a most critical position. She had fallen into an ambush of those who were intent on getting her out of the way. Must she really die?"

"Yes," answered Duplessis, "she must die. She will be killed with a dagger thrust by the Corsican Assiani"

Millet dropped into a chair, struck his fist on the table, and exclaimed:—

"I have no luck—no luck at all."

"But what has that to do with my Countess?" asked the novelist.

"Everything. My father bet with me that the Countess would die. I took his bet, because I thought you would be obliged to rescue her from her perilous position so as to use her in the rest of the story."

"How much did you bet?"

"Ten louis d'or."

"The devil you did! That's too much."

"Yes, yes, too much, and I with all my debts?" wailed Millet. "Can't you help me?"

Duplessis reflected a minute, looked at his watch, and said:—

"It is 9 o'clock. The page on which my story appears will go to press in half an hour. If we hurry we may reach the office in time to save the Countess."

In an instant Millet was in the street shouting for a cab, and Duplessis was close behind him. Both men were hatless. The cab came, they jumped in, and drove off like mad to the office of the Patrie. They arrived there at the last minute. The section of the novel prepared for the next day was hastily withdrawn and a harmless African story was shoved into its place. Duplessis worked all night saving the Countess, aad appeared on the following afternoon at the Patrie office with a revised edition of the next chapters of his novel. The Countess had been saved, and with her Millet's ten louis d'or.—N. Y. Sun.

How to Go to Sleep.

"If you want to go to sleep quickly," said a physician the other day, "drink a half pint of hot water or hot milk. I don't say it will act in every case, but I will adventure my opinion that it will act in eight cases out of ten. Beef tea is also good. Of coarse you will always find people ready to overdo this. When I said to a lady patient some time ago that feeding the stomach on retiring produced sleep, I was called on the following day. She had eaten what you call a square meal."—Chicago Tribune.

Henry M. Stanley is reported as saying that there is no need of further exploration of Africa. "Progress will do all of that. DAN MITERS.

CHAPTER I.

Dan Miters was especially drunk. By this I mean that any other man in the village of Cane Hill might have been drunk—and indeed other men of that respectable community had been known to indulge too heartily in drink—but that Dan Miters, being the acknowledged drunkard of the place, was especially and particularly intoxicated. He was a man of acknowledged sense. He had, gossip said, as a prelude to some disparaging statement concerning his weakness, carried off the honors at a well-known school. One thing was certain. He expressed himself in better language than even the county judge could hope to employ, and this, at Cane Hill, was regarded as a convincing assertion of a higher education.

Dan had first come to the village as the agent of a nursery; not that sort of a nursery which would disprove the declaration that marriage, among the poor at least, is a failure to perpetuate human misery, but as the agent of a company which had fruit trees for sale. He did not thoroughly succeed in running the gauntlet of village curiosity, for villagers are critical of appearances, and a lazy lounger who sits all day at the store, while his wife is taking in washing—the utterly worthless fellow who would rather wallow in the mire with a black falsehood than to recline on a velvet couch with a bright truth; who wears a filthy shirt and one "bed tick" suspender; who chews charity tobacco and spits at a knot-hole which, he thinks by the right of his own yellow slime, he has pre-empted—that fellow will criticise the clothes and facial ex pression of a stranger.

Dan was criticised, not only by the worthless loafer, but by the merchant, and even by the faded woman who had slipped in to exchange a few eggs for a small piece of calico. They declared that Dan's hair was too red, and that there were too many freckles on his face; and it was agreed that he did not dress as a gentleman should. The worthless loafer squirted at his pre-empted knot-hole and remarked:

That was a long time ago. Dan was absorbed into the community's social system, and became celebrated as the village drunkard. Previous to his achievement of this distinction, the fame had belonged to one Peter B. Rush, and it appeared that he could never be robbed of the reputation which he had laboriously acquired, but after a few years of contest, Peter B. Rush's warmest admirers were forced to acknowledge that the palm belonged to Dan Miters. What a handy man was Miters when a comparison was needed! What an encouragement to innovation! A man, in speaking of some one who was stupidly influenced by liquor, was no longer under the necessity of saying that he was as drunk as the disreputable canine associate of the fiddler, but simply fulfilled all demands by affirming that he was as drunk as Dan Miters.

Seriously—and unfortunately we are all compelled to be serious at times—the man of twenty-five whose education had not been neglected was at forty-five, a hopeless vagabond, with every hope trampled into the mud away down the road behind him. He did odd jobs, cleaned out cellars, and cut fire-wood for scolding women.

One day, when he appeared to be soberer than usual, the mayor of the village thus addressed him:

"Dan, I would like to know something about your life."

"And I, sir," Dan replied, "would like to know something about my death."

"You are a funny fellow, Dan."

"No doubt of it, sir. A corpse has been known to grin."

"Come, don't talk that way. You have been here now about twenty years and none of us know where you were born."

"And do you really want to know where I was born?"

"Yes, I'd like to know."

"Well sir, I was born in the night."

"There you go again. Say, do you know that if you would brace up there is yet time for you to accomplish something?"

"Yes? But you have tried, and what have you accomplished?"

"Why, I own a good house and lot —I am married and have a family of interesting children."

"Is that all?"

"But isn't that enough?"

"Hardly, for you have not taught your children not to feel, and until you do this your marriage stands as a wrong. About a year ago one of your boys lost an arm at a saw-mill. Weren't you the primary cause of his suffering, and is not a primary cause the meanest of all causes?"

"I won't talk to you," the mayor declared. "There is no reason in your argument and no humanity in your conclusions. But come," he added in a softened voice, "why don't you make an effort to keep sober?"

"I don't want to keep sober."

"And why not?"

"Because sobriety is the mother of thought."

"And you don't want to think—is that it?"

"Yes."

"And why don't you want to think? Your thoughts might amount to something. The greatest man, you know, is the greatest thinker."

"So is the greatest sufferer."

"And when you think, you suffer, eh?"

"Yes, and so do all men. Go into a library and look about you. What do you see?"

"Books," the mayor answered.

"And what are books?"

"Gifts from superior minds."

"No," said the drunkard. "They are the records of human suffering. Every great book is an ache from a heart and a pain-throb from a brain. But what's the use of all this talk? What concerns me most at present is, where am I going to get a drink?"

"You don't need a drink, Dan."

"There you go with your dogmatism. There you go measuring the grains of my want in your half-bushel. You don't need a drink and you say that I don't. I would not presume to say what other men need, but it seems to be the province of all other men to dictate to me. Come I am growing too sober, and shall begin to think pretty soon. Won't you please help me out? Let me have twenty-five cents; you can spare it. A man who doesn't drink has but little real need for money, anyway. Let me have twenty-five cents and I'll do any sort of work you want me to."

"Will you help me fix up the address I've got to deliver at that political gathering?"

"Yes, I will."

"And swear you'll never tell that you helped me?"

"Yes, I'll do that, too."

"And you will draw up a paper swearing that you didn't write the the address I delivered last month at Oddfellows? I want you to do this, for I have heard it hinted around that you had a hand in it."

"Yes, I'll do anything."

Dan was about to turn away after receiving the money, when he caught sight of a woman crossing the court-yard.

"Who is that," he asked.

"Mrs. Burkley, the widow we have employed to teach our school," the mayor answered.

"Where did she come from?"

"From Wilson County, I believe. Did you ever meet her?"

"I think not," he said, and hastened toward a doggery on the opposite side of the street.

CHAPTER II.

On a hill a short distance from the village, a hill shaded by poplar trees, was an old school-house, originally built of logs, but now, weather-boarded and white-washed. The Widow Burkley had just told the children that they might go out and play until she called them, when the door was darkened by a reddish apparition. The widow uttered a befitting little shriek, and then, realizing no serious cause for alarm, said: "Come in." She would not have extended this invitation had she not wanted to set an example of courage.

Dan Miters stepped into the room. He stood for a moment, looking at the widow, and then said: "Don't be afraid of me. I saw you yesterday and didn't know but you—"

"Is it possible!" exclaimed the woman.

"That is what I was going to ask," Dan replied, seating himself on a bench "Twenty years make a great change in appearances, even though hearts some times remain the same."

"Have you come here to reproach me? Children," she added turning to several youngsters that showed a disposition to loiter about the door, "run along now and play."

The children vanished, and the widow, after looking about to see if they were in hearing, said: "I have suffered too much to bear reproach now,"

"But don't you think that you are deserving of reproach?" he asked.

"No I acted as I thought best. I promised to marry you, and while you were with me, you did exercise so strong an influence that I thought I loved you but when you were gone, I knew that I didn't. I saw that I was charmed by your mind, but not charmed by your heart. Another man came. He was not bright, he had many foolish words, but love is expressed in words that are foolish. You awoke my admiration; he thrilled my heart. Then I wrote and told you not to think of me again. I was buried in the roses of my own happiness. How could I think of you?"

"And you married that man?"

"Yes."

"And were you happy?"

"For a time. Then the dew fell off the flowers. What could the flowers do but wither? We went to a distant town, and there he deserted me."

"Is he still living?"

"He was hanged."

"Do you love his memory?" "No for I have learned to think, and thought is a dagger to foolish love."

"Did you know that I was here?"

"No; some one told me that you were lost at sea."

"Did you sorrow over the news?"

"No; I did not love you."

"Did you not hear something else?"

"Not until a year ago, and then I heard that you were alive and a hopeless drunkard."

"Weren't you moved at that?"

"I was moved with pity."

"And would your pity sink deeper in o your heart if I were to tell you that I am the most hopeless of all drunkards? Look at me. Look." He opened his coat. "I have given my old shirt to a negro for a drink. Does your pity sink deeper?"

"Oh, please go away, George, go away. You distress me nearly to death. My God! I have suffered enough."

"Ah, but not for me. You have suffered because your own heart has been wrung; you have not suffered because of my degradation and despair. Mary, you still have it in your power to save me. With your help I can kill my appetite. I can do something for us both. Be my wife and atone for the awful wreck you made years ago."

"George I have always been true to myself. I don't love you."

"Couldn't you learn—couldn't there be progress?"

"There could be progress, but that progress would be toward hatred."

He looked at her in silence. He took up his old hat, which had been dropped on the floor, and turned it round and round in his hand. He looked down at his shoes, from which his toes protruded. He got up with a stagger, gazed at her a moment, and then an expression like that which follows the swallowing of a bitter draught, broke through the red stubble about his mouth. "Mrs.—I don't know your name," he began, "but Mrs. somebody, you are the most merciless creature that ever lived."

"The children say I'm kind."

"You have the spirit of a vampire."

"The children think I have the spirit of gentleness."

"I hope you die the most horrible of all deaths. I pray to God that you may die of hydrophobia—I implore God that a mad dog may bury his teeth in your throat."

"Go away!" she answered. "Come, children," she cried. "Go away from here, you monster! I hate you! I wish —but I can't think of anything horrible enough. Now go."

The village was the scene of fear-inspired ferment. A report that a powerful mad dog had been seen in the neighborhood had been brought in by an excited farmer. The bravest of men shudder at the sight of a mad dog. Men that would fight a grizzle bear tremble when they see a mad dog. Every man in the village went armed. Double fastenings were put on every door. The Widow Burkley was terror-stricken. She could not be induced to leave her room. Gradually the excitement died away. School was resumed, but the widow was tremulous.

She left the school-house very late one evening. Two rebellious boys had been kept in. When liberated the boys ran away. The widow tried to keep up with them. She could not. She was hurrying along the path when a man came dashing past on a horse. "Mad dog! mad dog!" he yelled. She screamed and looked back. The dog was bounding toward her. She fainted.

No one had the courage to look for the widow. Late at night, almost a maniac, she knocked at the door of the house where she boarded.

Morning came. A startling discovery was made. Dan and the mad dog were found lying across the path near the place where the widow had fainted. The dog's teeth were buried in Dan's throat. Dan's fingers were stiffened about the dog's neck. Both were dead. —Pioneer Press.

SHE WANTED THE NEWS.

A Woman's Idea of What Is Interesting in a Daily Newspaper.

"If there's any important news." said the newspaper man's wife, "wake me up when you come home and tell me about it."

And the next morning as he was walking home he hastily reviewed the news of the night to put himself in shape.

"Wake up," he said when he got there. "There's a war with Italy on.

"About what?" she asked, as she yawned and stretched her arms.

"Why, you know, in that New Orleans affair"——

"Oh, that old thing," she interupted. "What else?"

"Well, at one of the Harrison meetings to-night"——

"Oh, yes, of course. Politics—always politics."

"Lyman Gage has refused——',

"Who cares. Give me some news."

"Chauncy Depew has been indicted by"——

"That railroad accident, of course."

"Well, then, the Princess"——

"A European scandal. There's one every day."

The newspaper man sighed, thought a moment, and then said:

"I don't think of anything more except a little local paragraph about Mrs. Brown having left her husband!"

"Mrs. Brown! No! You don't mean it!" and she sat up in bed. "Why, she only lives a few blocks from here. I see her go by nearly every day. What do you suppose is the matter? Will either of them apply for divorce?"

"I don't know," he said. "There isn't much doubt about it."

She looked at him scornfully for a moment and then said:

"And you pretend to get out a newspaper. Bah!"—Chicago Tribune.

The Cat at the Grave.

A strange story, in which a cat is a pathetic character, has come to light at Paoli, Ga. A little boy of that village owned a cat that was a great pet in the family. But the cat would have nothing to do with any one except the boy. The latter died, and for two weeks the cat would come as usual every morning to the door, and, going in the room, would cry very mournfully, and walk over the child's bed hunting for its lost friend. Finally the cat disappeared, only returning occasionally. At last one of the child's sisters saw the cat in the graveyard, where it remains, only returning occasionally for food. "It keeps guard at the boy's grave, and can be heard at night crying pitifully."—Savannah News.

BEAUTY'S BLIGHT.

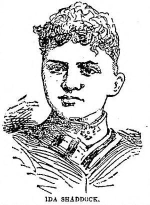
IDA SHADDOCK'S LOYAL LOVER.

His Faith Survived the World's Ill Report and the Girl's Shameful Death. Little Delphine in Tights—Misfortunes of a Devoted Couple.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

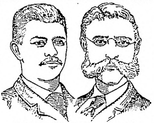


IDA SHADDOCK.

Folly is not without subjects even in these days of so called level headedness and common sense. Throughout the world's history the sentimental heart has fought against the sensible brain in the tourneys of love, and nearly always the heart has conquered. Generally the happiest results have ensued, but sometimes victory has brought in its train disaster, shame and misery unutterable.

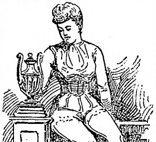
Were the conditions otherwise the appended tales of three cities could not have been written.

Ida Shaddock was the belle of Sites, Colusa county, Cal., the daughter of a well to do artisan and the promised wife of John McCarville In all her twenty five years of life scandal had aimed no arrow at her maiden fame, and she stood in good repute, while stretching before her appeared a bright and cloudless future Some weeks ago she went to San Francisco, and thereafter the story of her fate is this: The other morning, when the train from the California metropolis arrived at Benicia, an unknown young woman was assisted to the platform in a dying condition. She expired while being conveyed to a hotel, and an inquest showed that she was a victim of surgical butchery. It also developed that she was Ida Shaddock, and that she had been placed on the cars at San Francisco by Dr. Samuel H. Hall After much questioning the physician admitted that the girl had been under his professional care. He said she started on her journey home against his advice, persisting that she was strong enough to undertake the trip. Fellow passengers, however, came forward and testified that Hall must have known she was dying, as she was semiconscious when he assisted her to a seat in the car.



JACK M'CARVILLE—DR. S. H. HALL.

At this point John McCarville, who is a railway engineer, took a hand in the search for facts. Half distracted with grief he insisted on the absolute purity of his dead sweetheart, and only gave up his belief when confronted by the most overwhelming proof to the contrary. But in face of all the evidence he sought to shield her good name, while at the same time trying to secure the punishment of those he thought responsible for her death. His course was resented by Dr. Hall, who with his son lured the young engineer into a room and gave him a terrible beating. The physician claims that Miss Shaddock voluntarily placed herself in his charge after being treated elsewhere, and that he is innocent of any act of criminality or inhumanity. The case seems to be a very complicated one, and the truth may never be known. As it stands, the girl has died a shameful death, her medical attendant is in trouble, her lover is half crazed with grief, and her stalwart father's heart is nearly broken.



LITTLE DELPHINE.

There is less of actual tragedy but nearly as much scandal connected with a divorce suit now absorbing the attention of the people of St. Louis. Bettie Ertel is seeking legal separation from her husband, Frank J. Ertel, and when her lawyers filed some depositions the other day there was a sensation in court, for attached to one of the documents was a large photograph of a woman, chiefly clad in white tights. The picture bore the inscription, "To Fred from his little Delphine." "Fred," it is claimed, was Mr. Ertel's alias when away from home, and "little Delphine" is said to be Miss Delphine Paquet, of Chicago. She is twenty three years of age, and according to the testimony of two witnesses was known at various hotels in Florida, Missouri, Illinois and California as the wife of the defendant. The picture, now made part of the evidence in the case, was taken by a San Francisco photographer.

It is pleasant to turn from these somber views of sin and contemplate a romance of real life that has about it no taint of ill repute or wrong doing. For four years Fred and Ella Wassman, of New York city, have been man and wife, and during all that time they have been true lovers as well. The cloud that recently fell across their sunlit path was one of petty concealment, and a tragedy nearly followed the discovery of the tacit deceit. One morning Fred met some old friends, and that he might enjoy their company secured a day's leave of absence from the manufacturing firm by which he is employed. He didn't tell Ella about it, and right there the trouble began. She learned through another source that he had been away from his desk, and like many another sensitively affectionate wife began to "imagine things." Finally she settled down to the belief that her idolized husband had fallen under the spell of some unknown woman's charms. A coldness sprang up between the married lovers, and Fred also took to imagining. He figured it out that he was only a plain every day toiler, and that perhaps some richer and better dressed fellow engrossed his darling's fancy. One afternoon Mrs. Wassman visited her mother and staid longer than she had intended. Mr. Wassman on getting home from the office found the house vacant and no supper on the table. He concluded that his wife had fled, so he packed his valise and went to the home of a friend, where he talked over the situation and spent the night. Soon after his departure Ella arrived, and she decided that Fred had run away She cried all night and departed the next morning, leaving behind her this note:

DEAR FRED—I see you took your suit, and I can see all hope is lost with me. You know I cannot live without your love, so I will end it all when I have the courage. I have waited with your supper for you until I looked in the closet and saw that you took your clothes, and that settled me. Goodby, darling; dear, dear love, goodby. God bless you and the one you love. I have nothing against you. Goodby. Your ever faithful wife. ELLA.

FRED WASSMAN.

But she didn't go to the river. A saner impulse took her to her mother's arms, where she sobbed out her tale of grief and despair The next day Fred sought his little home, hoping that Ella had repented of her infatuation and returned. Instead he discovered her pitiful, heartbroken letter. Realizing his mistake, and believing himself responsible for his wife's suicide, he procured some Paris green, swallowed it and lay down to die. The shrieks produced by the pains of arsenical poisoning attracted the neighbors, and Wassman was taken to a hospital and filled with antidotes. Ella heard of his rash act and rushed to his side. Mutual explanations were followed by mutual promises never, never to be jealous again, and as soon as Fred got well and had apologized for his attempt at suicide to a police magistrate the reunited couple went home hand in hand and rebegan their honeymooning.

F. X. WHITE.

Slain on the Stage.

Amateur theatricals are all very well in their way, but it often chances that the would-be Thespians grow too earnest and substitute fact for fiction. This earnestness went to the extent of one actor killing another at Manchester, England, recently. The play was "Romeo and Juliet." Mercutio and Tybalt fought, and the former fell, not according to the directions of the stage manager, but bleeding from nose and mouth. The part was performed by a young man named Thomas Wilson Whalley, apprenticed as a compositor. He was at once taken to the hospital, but died before reaching that institution. A postmortem examination showed that a sword had penetrated his chest to a depth of seven inches.

At the inquest Ernest Thompson, who was playing Tybalt, stated that Romeo passed between him and Mercutio, instead of knocking their swords up. Witness had to make a lunge at Mercutio past Romeo's body. He could not see whether he struck Mercutio, but he felt no resistance to his sword, and did not think he used sufficient force to cause a wound.

The coroner, in addressing the jury, said he did not suppose any of them thought this was more than an accident. The jury returned a verdict of death from loss of blood from a wound received while taking part in a dramatic performance.

The Lessons of the Slums.

Life in the slums of a great city gives to the young unnatural precocity and a sort of low cunning that fit in well with a criminal career. An example of this class is Benjamin Gordon, of New York city. He is shrunken in body, withered of face, very small, and might be anywhere from twelve to eighteen years of age. In pleading guilty to a charge of larceny the other day he said he was sixteen years old. This was that he might receive a short sentence to Blackwell's Island, as lads of tenderer age are sent to the Refuge for long terms. The judge deferred sentence until he could get more information on the point at issue.

Too Strong a Diet.

It isn't well to take a fakir seriously and believe that he does the things he seems to do. Joseph Gunn, aged eighteen, was credulous and is now seriously ill in the Hartford hospital from the effects of swallowing metal filings, screws and nails. As the result of a visit to a dime museum, where a man ate glass, etc.—or pretended to—Gunn proceeded to load himself with a charge of canister, and the doctors are afraid he will die.

A Comedy in White and Yellow.

The unwisdom and woes of a Muskegon man are furnishing mirth for the press of the country just at present. He went to Whitehall the other day and bought 120 dozen eggs. He hitched his team to an empty freight car while waiting for his train at the depot, and when he wasn't looking an engine hauled the freight car away. The wagon was upset, and it was necessary to get a gang of men to clear the track.

No Censorship.

Justice Harlan, of the supreme court of the United States, in lecture before the Law College of the University of Wisconsin on "Constitutional Law," give the allowing compliment to the press of the country:

"Nor shall congress make any laws abridging the freedom of the press." This is a wise provision. There are some men, stung to buck by what they see in the newspapers, who would favor a law that would place the press of the country under a censorship.

Much may be said against the manner in which the newspapars are often conducted, but I do not think that I overestimate their value when I say that we depend largely for our real protection in this country upon the vigilance of the press. It is almost impossible in this country, as long as the press is not muzzled, for corruption to hold sway for any great length of time. There are those think that everthing is going to pieces, that the nation is becoming as corrupt as all the nations of the earth, and they affect to think so because they see so many things in the newspaper. I want however, to express the conviction that we are a good deal better off than we were fifty years ago. Not that I remember myself, but judging from what I have heard, we are not growing worse; we are getting better. The standard of public morality and virtue is higher than it was twenty-five years ago.

Our public men, what ever may be said to the contrary, in the congress of the United States are, in their moral character, a higher grade of men than were there twenty-five or fifty years ago. There are less vices among them. Old men, who remember what existed in Washington thirty or forty years ago, all say that. Now, I believe that a vast deal of this is due to the fact that the public press of this country is every day and every hour of our existence turning its light into the dark places, and ferreting out corruptions in their birth, and bringing before the people of this country that which they ought to know, and therefore I believe in this provision of the bill of rights.

The White Slaves.

About 150 emigrants left Sweden via Hamburg, the last of April; for the Province of Rio Grande do Sol, in Brazil. The emigrant agents, who are working in the intrests of the steamship companies of Germany, have invaded the Scandinavian countries in search of victims to send to the torrid country of the yellow fever, snake bites and starvation, as the Sweedish papers call Brazil. The emigrant agents are taking a new tack to get followers. It seems that Brazel has offered so much per head for all foreign emigrants landed on their shores. The slave traffic from "Darkest Africa" has been cut off by the British men of war and Brazil in sore need of help to work her plantations. As there are no restrictons in international law on white slaves she goes to the Anglo-Saxons who prohibit slavery, for her drudges. All she has to do is to pay the steamship company their passage and she gets her white slaves cheaper and with less danger than her black ones. These emigrant do not have a large emigration to Brazil by any means an account of the opposition from the papers, but they get enough to make money out of the deal. In Malmo and Stockholm they have hired native agents to go out through the country districts to gather up parties offering free passage to men and their families and work on the plantations when they get to Brazil. The Stockholm Dagblad publishes a short paragraph of what the Belgian consul in Brazil has to say about this European emigration.

"The condition of Europeans who have come to Brazil," he says, "is without question most deplorable." The food, is coffee, rough cakes and a sun dried meat and the wages are such that a Chinaman would refuse them. The work in that climate, he further states, under the glaring heat is more than a Northerner can stand and yellow fever and starvation carries them off by hundreds.

In the city of Campian over 6,000 people are sick with the fever. Many a poor emigrant dies from want of care. In many cases they are 600 miles in the interior, and then, if they have no one to assist them to the coast, they must die in the wilderness. A person from Sundsvall has stated that he, with a party of 300 emigrants, will soon take passage for Brazil. He says: "It is far better to go to Brazil than to work in the Sundsvall sawmills at home, where it is overcrowded with people, and the weight of the planks is getting heavier to handle every succeeding year and the loaf is getting smaller." The authorities will no doubt have to take hold of the matter sooner or later and investigate Brazilian emigration to the bottom.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7.—The direct tax refund law, passed during the closing days of the last congress, has already drawn more than nine million dollars from the treasury. In round numbers the amounts refunded, so far, to different states are as follows: Arkansas, $156,000, California, $208,000, Colorado, $22,000, Delaware, $70,000, Illinois, $959,000, Indiana, $720.000, Kansas, $60,000, Maine, $357,000, Massachussetts, $696,000, Michigan, $420,000, Minnesota, 86,000, Missouri, $647,958, New Hampshire, $182,000, New Jersey, $382,000, New York, $2,013.000, North Carolina, $377,000, Ohio, $2,332,000, Tennessee $292.000.

Secretary Proctor, General Schofield and in fact army officers generally are very much pleased with the success met with in the enlistment of Indians in the army. They think the successful enlistment of Indians will go a great way towards solving the Indian question and making the red man self-supporting. Already three companies have been formed and the department expects to have others in a short time. It is the intention to utilize Indians who graduate from the Indian schools, in the capacity of tailors, cooks, mechanics, blacksmiths, etc., in connection with the Indian companies, and the Indian bureau will bend its energies to educate young Indians to fill such positions.

Under the provisions of the McKinley bill all special taxes imposed upon dealers in leaf and manufactured tobacco, and manufacturers of cigars and tobacco, are repealed from and after the first of May, present month. Treasury department officials think the abolition of this special tax will cause a loss of $1,600,000 revenue annually to the government; but the men who smoke and chew will continue to pay just the same price for their weed. On the other hand customs receipts during April fell off seven millions and a quarter, compared with the receipts in April last year. Fully five millions of this loss of revenue it is estimated, is due to the free sugar clause of the McKinley law, which went into operation on the first of April. The price of sugar, however, has fallen two cents a lb, so the consumer everywhere gets cheaper sugar as a result, but it is going to cut down Uncle Sam's revenue to the extent of about sixty millions a year.

Since the convention of the Republican Leagues clubs in Cincinnati last month, a movement has been started in New York City to raise an immense fund with which to erect a magnificent building in Washington, which will be the national headquarters of the League, and also of the national republican committee. The scheme is to get one thousand republicans throughout the country to subscribe $300 each, and with the sum thus raised, to build a club house, equal if not superior to the Union League Club house of New York City. The national Association of Democratic clubs, as well as the National Democratic committe will, it is believed, follow suit and establish headquarters in this city.

Until a month or so it was believed that seal catching in Behring Sea this summer would be open to all comers, and that the revenue steamers Corwin and Kush, that usually patrol those waters, would receive confidential instructions not to molest poaching vessels beyond the three-mile limit. But it is believed now that our government, acting on repeated intimations from the British government, will endeavor to stop further injury to the sealing interests by shutting down the seal killing operations at the Prililo Islands, until international regulations for the government of Behring Sea and its Fisheries are agreed upon by the powers interested. This action has been urged by treasury department agents who say that if poaching by British vessels and seal killing by the American Seal Fur company is not stopped very soon the seal will become extinct; and hence it is urged that their indiscriminate slaughter be discontinued for a period to allow breeding. Notice of a complete change in the government's Behring sea policy is looked for soon, and before the summer season is over it is confidently expected that war vessels of Great Britain, Russia and the United States will be working in concert and patroling Behring Sea to prevent the threatened extinction of the seal.

From an Admirer.

A subscriber in Ottertail County, in renewing his subscription, casually jots the following: "I was not certain that the Gazette was running till mention was recently made of it. It must have a calm time in that remote quarter. Keep the NEWS at the centre and at the top. Do all possible to discourage the evils that afflict humanity [that is our highest ambition—ED.] and may a pure Christianity multiply its blessings in your community. May your "Echoes of the Rapids" never be less. Wish we could hear that your city is ready to join Archbishop Ireland in denouncing the drink traffic."

How to Say NO.

It is strange how few people there are who have the courage to say No, and mean it. A man may be great in many things, but when the occasion arises when his better intellect teaches him he should say No, he weakens, and we more often hear him say, "I don't think so," or some such indefinite semi-negative. It is much easier to say Yes—this flatters or pleases. But even if a decisive No displeases your hearers it is much better; more honest and more manly to use the direct negative when you know it should be used. Many a life has been made unhappy by the indecision which follows an advice where the counselor was too weak to say No.

A Bachelor's Club.

EDITOR NEWS: The bachelors or grass-widowers of Red Lake Falls are getting so numerous that they begin to feel their strength and will shortly organize for the purpose of mutual felicity and self defence. The following are a few of the model requirements for all applicants for membership:

He must pledge himself to keep his wife away from home as long as possible. There is no mitigation to this rule.

He must promise to shave twice a week and in every other way so manipulate himself that he will "reflect credit" upon the club.

Every applicant must give his word of honor (which is sufficient in this instance the motive being a strong one) to pay particular attention to the rules of health lest the woman getting wind of his condition, might hasten home. In that case his affliction will be so great as to merit a vote of sympathy from the club.

If there are houseplants left in his care he will be required to pay especial attention and water them once in three weeks, giving them plenty of sun light.

Every member must know the arts of playing poker. Any applicant who may be so far behind the times as to be barred out on this score will be allowed one weeks' grace; if, at the next meeting, he is still disabled, through his ignorance on this subject, he will be peremptorily discharged, blacklisted and branded forever as a presumptous knave who would act the drone in an active and useful club.

The residence of every member must at all times be open to the club.

There will be other regulations for the members after they become such.

ONEOF'EM.

A Hemp Crop.

Ex-warden Ranall said in the Winona Republican: I have been in Kentucky looking up the hemp business, and I think it will be a good crop for the farmers of Minnesota, especially in the valleys along the Mississippi river. The fiber is worth in Kentucky now, as the farmers bring it to market, $4.50 to $5 per 100 pounds. They average from 1,000 to 1,500 pounds per acre, the crops averaging about $60 per acre. Seed is worth $5 to $6 a bushel, and they sow 1¼ bushels to the acre. A gentleman who owns considerable land and hires farmers to raise and prepare the flax for market, says it costs him about $25 per acre, including the seed, leaving him $30 to $35 per acre for the use of the land. The land has to be well plowed and pulverized. They cut the flax before the seed begins to mature, leaving it on the ground three or four days, or until properly wilted, when it is bound and stacked, where it goes through a "sweat. Then it is spread on the ground, and when properly rotted, taken up and put in shocks, where it stands until they are ready to break and separate the fiber from the woody part. They break it with an old-fashioned flax break by hand, and whip the shives out of it, when it is ready for market. I bought a carload of hemp fiber of J. T. Smith, of Heron Lake, this State. Mr. Smith has raised hemp for two or three years and sold his fiber in Ohio and Chicago. He will have 150 tons this year. He says it is equal to any hemp raised in Kentucky. He has made a machine and breaks his hemp with power. The state is now putting on machinery in the prison here, with a capacity of 3,000 to 3,000 pounds per day, and wall put in additional machinery, which well make a home market for a large amount of fibre, and once they commence raising it, factories will be built for the manufacture of cordage of all kinds.

THE COMING MAN.

Weary eyelids gently close,
Ruddy lips half parted lie,
Erstwhile busy hands repose,
Precious toys rest idly by.

Battered subjects of his throne,
Soldiers maimed and horses blind
Tell the despot he has grown
Since he left his skirts behind.

These, his minions, he, their master
Wields his tiny strength to rule,
Never dreaming of that vaster
Realm—the world—his future school.

And I sigh not at the sight
Do not now, and shall not then
When my baby's tiny might,
Larger grown, shall conquer men.

AT THE GIANT'S CAUSEWAY

They were proceeding slowly round the winding path which leads from the sea and the Causeway to the high road, near which their hotel lay (expressly built in that situation for the convenience of visitors to the far-famed resort of the "giants," if ever it was such), when their attention was attracted by a crowd of people assembled at the extreme edge of one of the highest headlands.

"What is the matter?" said Sir James to the guide who had conducted them over the wonders of the place, and had become a great ally of theirs.

"I don't know, yer honor, but I'll be off and find out;"—and suiting the action to the word, the guide strode towards the spot where, gesticulating and shouting in a fearful manner, some twenty or thirty peasants were congregated.

But the inquiring guide did not quickly return, his interest or curiosity became equally absorbed with that of the people already assembled on the height, and our party had themselves reached the crowd before they again saw him. In the midst of the group of men and women sat a little girl, about six years old; a small basket was at her side, filled with boxes of "specimens" (as the natives call them) of the various geological treasures of the place. Above the coarse wooden boxes containing these stones lay several garlands of primroses, the little dealer in geology had been industriously threading these into flowery chains, which she had been taught to fling over the heads of the visitors, whose custom for her "specimens" she generally ensnared in this way, her innocent winning ways invariably attracting attention in the first instance, and her singular story afterwards riveting it, and often calling forth the substantial kindness of those who bought of her little stores.

The child, accustomed to the rough weather and tempestuous waves of that rude coast, seemed at ease in the midst of the crowd and bustle; she was, however, unconscious of the cause of unusual excitement now, and, wholly occupied with her own little trade, she took a garland from her basket and ran towards the party of visitors as they approached, intending to capture a purchaser for her wares. The wreath was long, but Lady Anne being tall, and the child very small, the latter could not succeed in flinging it over her head, though she jumped as high as she could to reach her; just as she had nearly succeeded, through the good-natured bending down of Lady Anne, who suspected and comprehended at once the snare and its object, the guide came towards them, and regardless of, or not noticing the child's presence, exclaimed,—"It's poor Winny, yer honor, that was gathering dillisk and sloak, and she's slipped down that path that no crature scarcely ventures on but herself and the goats. The say is too angry to send out a boat, and no one dare thry the path now the wind is riz, so they're sending a creel down for her, it's the safest chance left."

Flowers, boxes, and basket fell from the child's hands as the man said these words.

"Nursey, nursey!" screamed she, springing towards the edge of the cliff, that, straight as a wall of jagged and broken faces and fissures, decended to the sea, whose tide foamed wildly in to its base and lashed the waters and spray many feet upwards.

"Oh, nursey! save her, take me to her!"

"Primrose," he cried, "nursey will be saved; stay quiet, child, they will bring her to you."

But the child would not be quiet; she struggled and clawed, and scratched at his face, and, in fact, was so earnest in her determination to get free and go to her nurse, that without really hurting her, he could not save himself from her attacks.

"Musha! what am I to do with the cratur?" said he, "They want me to steady the rope, and she's such a wild child, she'll run down the path if I let her go. She's as nimble as any goat of them all, and twice as 'cute; and only for the wind there is, and the say coming in so furious and fast, she might escape; but she'd have no chance now. May be, your honors could pacify her, and keep her quiet, till we gets the creel in tow."

The man, a physiognomist in his way, ventured this request to Lady Anne and O'Kennedy; he had not finished speaking, when they had half-forcibly, half-coaxingly, taken possession of the screaming, kicking child.

"You don't love your nurse," said Lady Anne, "or you would not prevent Patty from going to help her."

"Why did not he tell me that? I wouldn't have stopped him;—but I want to go too. I can go by the path. Nurse and I often go where none but we can go: we know how to climb the cliffs, they do not."

The child struggled again; at last they were obliged to tie her hands and feet with their handkerchiefs, and then, Sir James, curious and anxious for the fate of the poor woman, advanced to the edge of the height, at the foot of which he was informed she lay, coiled up and holding on as well as she could to the projecting ledges of rock, which were her only support, and from which the wild waves every moment, as they boomed onwards, threatened to dislodge her.

She had as usual, made her way down an almost perpendicular path, never frequented but by herself and the mountain goats, whom she rivalled in hardihood and nimbleness of foot. Harvest of marine vegetables had been more abundant than usual, and she had unwisely ventured on a deceitful shelf of stones and green, slimy sea-weeds, from which, her foot, slipping, she had been precipitated many feet downwards to the sands.

There she lay moaning and helpless, though not seriously injured.

But the high tide coming in, and with it a sudden change from mild to boisterous rough weather, she would have been soon carried out to sea, had she not succeeded in dragging herself beyond its reach, and in fastening herself to some jutting rocks, to which she clung and attached her hold like a sea anemone; but this refuge could not have been hers long, and she would soon have been swept from it and lost, but for a neighbor whom she had left with the child, who during her absence watched for customers.

Both the neighbor and the child wondered at Winny's unusually long absence, and the man becoming seriously alarmed when the weather grew stormy, on venturing a short distance down the path to discover, if possible, had anything gone wrong, though unable to proceed much more than half way down the steep, all but impassable descent, yet went far enough to catch a glimpse of what had occurred. To get the almost helpless woman up by the pathway, then beset with the additional dangers caused by a fierce strong wind, was not to be thought of; but summoning without a moment's delay the hardy peasants of the place, and by means of a trumpet shouting directions to Winny from the nearest hearing-point, they succeeded in lowering to her a creel and two long wattles, with which they desired her to balance herself from dangerous contact with the projecting rocks, and as O'Kennedy yet listened to his informant, the exclamations of the crowd warned him that the perilous ascent had commenced. His head grew dizzy, as he tried to look down from a jutting point of land a little to one side of the exciting spot towards which all eyes and hearts turned in dread. He grew sick as he caught an occasional glimpse of something swaying and swinging between earth, or rather sea and heaven, enveloped every moment with showers of thick spray thrown up by furious raging waters, and occasionally lost to sight from the juttings and projections of the green, slimecovered rocks.

The wind had risen fearfully, even within a few moments, and fortunate it was that it had not done so before the men, holding the coil of rope attached to the creel, had trumpeted their orders to the hapless voyager. Three men, who had formed themselves into a sort of human chain, had themselves to be held and supported by others, lest their strength or courage should give way, and lest they might be drawn over the precipice. At last, the basket and its occupant seemed to near the top of the height, and already the impulsive Irish peasants commenced their loud hurrahs of joy and triumph. O'Kennedy could now see her distinctly, as she knelt in the creel, holding in either hand the poles of her destiny, and guiding her frail conveyance.

"A few moments more, and she is saved," cried the foremost of the men who hauled the rope; but the words were scarce uttered, when a strand of the treacherous rope gave suddenly way.

Yielding at the pressure from below, and the hearty pulls from above, and heated and wasted by the sharp collision with the shelving rock at top, which had acted as a sort of windlass to the rope, and a partial defense against the precipice to the basket, the cord began to untwist in his hand. Ere the cry of horror had time to issue from the lips of the crowd another strand had loosened, and quickly began to unravel itself from the rest of the cordage. The life it sustained now almost literally hung upon a thread. In terror and agony almost equal to poor Winny's own, they ceased for a second to attempt drawing her up, lest the thread should snap on which her life depended. There she was, suspended some twenty feet from the landing-place; swayed hither and thither by the wind, and each instant expecting to be dashed to pieces, ere she could even reach a grave in the waters beneath. She felt thread after thread giving with her—down, down, she felt impelled by her own weight. But terrible as was the situation, the intrepid crags-woman's presence of mind did not desert her.

She knew that for the remaining cords to bear her in safety to the top would be impossible, but her courage rose with the occasion; and as the untwining rapidly proceeded, she took her resolution.

Fixing firmly first one, then the other of her two crutches on a jutting ledge of rock, on which there was room for her to land in safety, if her head could be kept steady, and so remain till another rope could be let down to her, she cautiously stepped from the creel; carefully retaining it, however, she placed it between her and the outward edge of the shelf on which she stood, whilst she leant back against the wall of precipice behind her. The last remaining threads of hemp would not have borne a cat's weight, and Winny dared not trust them even to hold the empty creel; she therefore cautiously placed one of her oars within it, and thus steadied it, and her own perilous position; here she remained, for at least thirty minutes, shaded partially, by adjoining projections, from the fury of the storm.

Each one of these minutes appeared a life to her. During this dreadful pause in her fate, the thought of the girl's helpless, unloved position was her only worldly care. But it brought a pang with it as severe as if the child were really her own. As the cold spasm passed through her heart, a raven, croaking hoarsely, passed close to where she stood. She tried to shrink into the rocks behind her, as she felt the brushing of his flapping and ominous wings; but a happy recollection counteracted the impression of these thoughts and this incident.

"He feeds the young ravens." said she; "Primrose will not perish, and neither shall I, if I am not chicken-hearted.

A minute afterwards, she could hear a grating sound, as down, down, there descended another basket and another rope. The men above knew not if the first creel were still safe, and they took the precaution to lower another; it passed the bewildered woman, whose senses were becoming confused, and in consequence she missed the right moment for seizing it; a second more, and the exertion to draw it back to her would probably have overbalanced her, but that second did not arrive before she had laid hold of and drawn it to her. She now discarded the first basket to make way for the second; and perhaps, at no moment the fearful agony of her position was more dangerous to her safety than when kicking it from her, in the little void between her and destruction yet unfilled by the other creel, she saw the abyss below; she could not, dared not, shut her eyes, nor yet open them to the perils before her, for up to that moment she had sought to steady her nerves by not looking beyond or above the basket. She had schooled her imagination in a marvelous manner to disbelieve, as it were, in her own position.

Drawing the cord towards her, she soon managed to place herself in her new vehicle, and a few moments afterwards saw her landed in triumph, amidst the excited group on the headland.

ONE KIND OF TYPEWRITER.

How the Family Gods Were Set Up in a Little Harlem Flat.

Out on Broadway just now I saw a little girl that I have big respect for. She is a typewriter, but she is not much like the kind the newspapers are always telling stories about. though, like them, she is pretty—pretty as a picture and as good as if she were old and ugly. She is 22, and let me tell you what she has done.

Six years ago she was the most ragged, friendless, ignorant little orphan you would care to hear of, and she had four younger sisters, each more ragged and friendless and ignorant and orphaned than the other. She went into a typewriting copying office to learn the business in return for her services as office girl. She was such a bad speller that everybody said she would never make a typewriter. She set in to learn to spell. She was so shabby that the head of the office said he was ashamed to send her on errands, but she did her work so well that he concluded it would pay to spend a couple of dollars in fixing her up.

She made herself a skillful operator, although to begin with she was uncommonly clumsy.

The fact was she had something else on her mind than finding a husband to support her. She was thinking about those four little sisters. They were living around with relatives, most of whom were very poor, and when they were not poor they were exceptionally cross and cruel to make up. This little woman, call her Annie if you wish, had an ambition to be a mother to those little sisters.

A mother? What she is now is mother and father, too!

The first money she could scrape together from the typewriting she spent learning stenography. She could not afford all the lessons she needed, but she made it up in hard work by herself. She was not gifted with the qualities for making the best stenographer—the best ones are born, not made—but she did all she could and came out better than the average that do office work, and since that she has had comparatively easy sailing.

People had noticed her: she got a good position: not much money, as you count money, but enough to start her in executing a long cherished plan.

She got together those four sisters. She took a little flat up-town. She gathered them all in and told them they must live without furniture until they could buy it, not on the installment plan. In the meanwhile they would all have plenty of good food such as they had not had before, because furniture is a luxury, but good food is an investment for working girls.

Two of the girls were learning typewriting in the same way she did, The two younger ones were in school. They camped along as best they could and were happy. That was a year and a half ago. Now three of them are earning good pay, as salaries go—there is a prejudice in that big office building where Annie is in favor of the family—one of the younger ones is learning the business in the old way. Their home is as pretty a little place in its modest way as there is in Harlem, and their relatives are more helpful and kind than ever before—because nothing succeeds like success.

And I call that young woman's success worth talking about—New York Herald.

Montreal Pudding.—Beat and strain three eggs through a sieve; add one wineglassful of milk, one tablespoonful of sugar, a little nutmeg, one-quarter of a pound of flour; stir this in gradually; mix all well together, and then stir in six or seven ounces of fine bread crumbs and half a pound of stoned raisins; butter well a pudding pail, and boil three hours steadily; serve with a rich sauce.

ABOUT THE WOMEN FOLKS.

New Silks for Summer Gowns--Fashion's Fancies--Summer Millinery--Women as Inventors--Moths.

New Silks for Summer Gowns.

Changeable twilled silks more finely twilled than surahs, with designs of dots, stripes, waving ribbons, and baskets of flowers, in ecruor white, promise to rival the smoothly woven India silks as summer dresses. They are made into charming dresses by Paris modistes, who delight in color this season, and add silk of a bright contrasting hue for their trimming. Thus a green and red changeable silk strewn with ecru baskets of flowers is trimmed with pale blue surah facings, and has a collar, plastron, and pointed belt of Louis Seize embroidery of rose-buds and gold done on pale blue cloth. The seamless bodice with coat skirts is a favorite model. The fronts gathered on the shoulders cross diagonally to lap under the blue belt and the changeable silk laid over pale blue surah, each frill cut with selvage finish. The wide back is shirred at the waist line. The coat skirts are three loops, ten inches deep when doubled, of the material showing facings of pale blue. They are slightly full, and are gathered to the bodice back of the pointed belt under a twist or scarf of the twilled silk. The mutton leg sleeves are very long, and without trimming. The skirt of five breadths has the front breadth turned under at the foot, and faced with blue to match the coat skirts, then falling open on each side on a flounce of pale blue silk. This design is not confirmed to changeable silks, but is beautifully carried out in foulards, as one with gray ground strewn with large white leaves, made up with a collar and belt of gold embroidery, and facings of yellow India silk in the frill and coat skirts.

Chameleon silks, as the changeable silks are called, are imported in glossy taffeta with tiny dots and figures, to be used for sleeves, vests, and flounces of wool dresses, and also in heavier faille, with chine' flowers and ribbon stripes for entire gown. A lovely house dress of yellow silk shading to pink has chine' bouquets of violets, roses, and carnations. It is made all in one piece, the skirt sewed to the round waist, which fastens invisibly in the back under a plastron of olive green velvet that extends the length of the bodice in front also. The silk is pleated full on the high shoulders, and drawn without darts next the velvet pieces. A single under-arm form is on the side. A standing frill of velvet edges the low rounded throat. Sleeves full to the elbow have a gathered frill below. The skirt of six breadths has three breadths for the front and sides, extending around to meet at the back, where three other demi-trained breadths are massed in pleats in scarcely an inch of space at the waist, and spread out widely below. White embroidery in upturned points is set at the foot of the skirt.

Fashion's Fancies.

Cloth-like fabrics are very popular this season.

The Louis Quinze coat basque is one of the leading styles for house and street wear,

Effective trimmings for an evening dress are the jeweled buttelies that are sold in sets, to be used for the hair, shoulders, front of corsage, and amid the drapery of the skirt.

Gilt and black passementeries and gimps are used for new costumes, while gilt frog ornaments are used on the front of basques and there are flat, open-interlaced insertions of gilt, and also gilt cord of twisted strands, that are used on the edge of seams and basques.

Green is the favorite color for fancy articles, and pretty little purses for young ladies are of green leather, ornamented with a silver monogram.

Silk is more used than it has been for many seasons, and panels, waistcoats, and sleeves of silk in most of the woolen stuffs are now seen.

Bengaline is the particular choice of the season, both plain and figured, because it is soft in drapery, lustrous, rich looking, and not expensive.

Light shades prevail for woolen materials, while cheviot, diagonal and serge wille be employed for traveling and street gowns.

The hair band, or small coronet, has been received for hair dressing, and it is set with jewels, just like the old-fashioned article, and is equally becoming with high or low coiffures.

A new Parisian fancy is to have small jewels sewed upon the material of the dress, and in some cases even knitted into the stockings.

Yellow is the favorite color of the season for dressy toilets, and for the decoration of plainer gowns, while white strewn with tiny sprays of pink roses and forget-me-nots is a most effective combination for waistcoats.

Women as Inventors.

Statistics which has been prepared at New York for the approaching centennial anniversary of the Patent Office prove that inventive genius has no sex. It will be encouraging to female wage-workers to learn that women inventors have made a record in the Patent Office of which they may well be proud. Application for patents of their own invention have been made by over 3,000 women since the Patent Office was organized. These inventions, while covering a wide field of articles for women's use, include such unexpected inventions as submarine telescopes, processes for hardening copper, foot stoves, refrigerators, and even locomotive driving wheels. As early as 1890 a patent was granted to Mary Kies, of Connecticut, for an improved method of straw weaving with silk or thread. Many patents were issued a few years after to women for improvements on corsets, foot stoves, spinning wheels, mocassins and ice cream freezers.

During the war a great number of women inventors came forward with many designs in canteens, military caps, ambulances and all kinds of hospital appliances. Prior to the war the number of women applicants for patents was small. Only three patents to women were issued in 1850; in 1860 there were only four, in 1870 there were sixty, in 1880, ninety. In 1887 the number rose to 187 and has been increasing steadily ever since.

The inventions of the women compare well with those of the men in usefulness and ingenuity. The most profitable inventions of women are those of costumes and clothing and artistic designs of wall paper and decorated china ware.—Evening Telegram.

Summer Millinery.

The summer bonnets are the airiest "creations" that have yet come from the milliner's hands. They are often mere saucers of sheer tulle projecting over the eyes, and made with a transparent crown of chiffon or gauze, or a perfectly open crown, partly veiled by a vine of roses.

The hat illustrated is of fancy lace straw in the new shade of Stanley brown, with a crown of maize-colored chiffon, studded with gold and brown wasps. Large jeweled butterflies stand up among the folds. With this hat is worn a high ruche of black lace, trimmed to correspond with the hat. Shapes already begin to vary from the toque, and there are many dainty little English cottage bonnets, in fine fancy straws and chips, that are trimmed in broad low effects, in contradistinction to the high styles of trimming generally seen, which build the flat shapes into considerable heighth. The new sailor hats, with a crown of ordinary heighth, but sunk in the rim so that it appears below the rim and but an inch or less above it, is a graceful style for young ladies. A wide band of fine flowers conceals the crown under the brim and forms a halo trimming around the face. A navy blue sailor in this shape and in a purplish cast of color is trimmed, simply, with a band of inch-wide black velvet, which passes around the crown and hangs down the back in a cluster, streamers and loops. The hat is finished by a full face trimming of violets or bluets. For regular street wear, the bonnet may match the costume in a darker shade, or a black bonnet may be worn, according to the fancy of the wearer.—Good Housekeeping.

Moths.

To exterminate carpet moths: Saturate a large cloth with water strongly impregnated with ammonia. After wringing it as dry as possible, spread upon the carpet, and iron until thoroughly dry. It is not advisable to press hard as that flattens the nap of the carpet. Go over the entire carpet in this manner. The hot steam not only kills the little pests and destroys their eggs, but with the addition of the ammonia freshens and brightens the carpet also.

To avoid carpet moths: If you find no apperance of moths in your carpets, use an "ounce of prevention." In other words, after your carpet has been laid, sponge thoroughly in a strong solution of salt and water. It is well, also, to sprinkle salt underneath the carpet, in dark corners, under bookcases, couches, etc., where the carpet is least used. Above all, keep your rooms sufficiently light, remembering that moths should be numbered among those wicked creatures who "prefer darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil."—Good Housekeeping.

Hints for the Cook.

Potato Croquettes.—To one pound of mashed potatoes add the beaten yelk of one egg, a little salt and pepper, two tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs or cracker meal, and one tablespoonful of milk. Stir over the fire until quite dry. Then place on a well-floured board, shape in croquettes, roll lightly in the flour, glaze with the beaten white of the egg, strew with bread crumbs and set aside till quite cold and firm. Immerse into hot fat until brown, drain and serve very hot.

Cocoanut Soup.—Three ounces of grated cocoanut, three pints of veal broth, some cold water, half a pint of cream, a little rice flour; salt to suit taste; add the cocoanut to the veal broth, and boil it gently for one hour; then add to it a little cold water add sufficient rice flour to make the soup thick enough; season to suit taste; and the cream, and then simmer all for a quarter of an hour; nutmeg or mace is an addition liked by some.

German Cream.—Boil one pint of cream with six ounces of loaf sugar and the peel of half a lemon cut very thin; as soon as it boils take it away from the fire and let it stand until nearly cold; then add the juice of two lemons and a wineglassful of brandy; pour the mixture from one dish to another quickly for ten minutes and it will be ready to serve; this cream should be made twelve hours before it is served.

Sponge Cake Cream.—Cut nine small sponge cakes in two and place them at the bottom and sides of a glass dish; pour half a wineglassful of brandy and the same quantity of sherry over them; add some raspberry jam or jelly, warmed a little; cover this with another layer of cakes and add the same quantity of brandy and wine; have ready half a pint of cold boiled custard, flavored, and when ready to serve pour this over the whole; add a few pieces of candied fruit.

Jenny Lind once prayed that God would save her from having to sing upon the stage. It is to be regretted that many alleged vocalists did not pray as the incomparable Jenny prayed, and that Providence had not a chance to take them at their word.

"August Flower"

Dyspepsia. There is a gentleman at Malden-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., named Captain A. G. Pareis, who has written us a letter in which it is evident that he has made up his mind concerning some things, and this is what he says:

"I have used your preparation called August Flower in my family for seven or eight years. It is constantly in my house, and we consider it the best remedy for Indigestion, and Constipation we

Indigestion. have ever used or known. My wife is troubled with Dyspepsia, and at times suffers very much after eating. The August Flower, however, relieves the difficulty. My wife frequently says to me when I am going to town, 'We are out Constipation of August Flower, and I think you had better get another bottle.' I am also troubled with Indigestion, and whenever I am, I take one or two teaspoonfuls before eating, for a day or two, and all trouble is removed."

POETRY WITH A POINT.

You can lead a horse to water,
But you can not make him drink;
You can send a fool to college,
But can not make him think;
You may keep your daughter strumming
From morn till afternoon,
But you can't make her a player
If she hasn't any tune.
You can never make a farmer
Of a boy that loves the sea,
Though you may make him plow and plan
And whoa, and haw, and gee.
It's no use to swear and bluster
Because your only son
Prefers the gal he met in the car
To your selected one;
You might as well switch off the track,
For love is lord of pelf,
And, beside, it's more than likely
That you know how 'tis yourself.
You can not make a citizen,
Let him be black or white,
Of the man who doesn't know enough
To cipher, read, and write.
You can not change the rooster's strut,
Nor make the layers crow,
Though you may honestly believe
It would be better so.
You can not make a person
Of the stage-struck Romeo lad;
And if you ever do succeed
You'll wish you never had.
There is only one thing meaner,
And that's to have to see
The name of your neighbor's numbskull
Finished with an M. D.
But all these things, and more, beside,
We may expect to hear,
Until the numbskull kills us,
And the Romeo says the prayer.

THE LINEN CLOSET.

"But surely there are more rooms?" The young widow who had come down to Garland to hire a little house for the summer had followed the agent into the two-story cottage, and was staring about her.

"Only four rooms?" she said. "Surely there were ten originally, ma'am," the agent replied. "There were ten, but the rest are boarded up. This is simply the wing, but you have a parlor, a dining-room and two bedrooms besides the little outside kitchen, which is a building by itself and the rent is actually nominal."

"But the folly of boarding up six good rooms," said the lady. "The parlor with the wainscot and the black-marble mantel-piece."

"You know the house?" cried the agent.

"Oh, in houses of this sort you always find a black marble mantel and a wainscot," said the lady. "And on the other side of the hall the sitting-room and spare bedroom, and three bedrooms up-stairs, and the linen closet and bathroom—the long, dark linen closet."

"The ghost always comes out of that," said the agent.

"Oh, ho!" cried the lady. "The cat is out of the bag, The house is haunted?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the agent. "It has that reputation among ignorant people. But since the main building has been boarded in, the figure has never been seen by any one."

"The figure?" asked the lady. "All in white like an ironing-board?"

"All in white, but like a pretty girl of sixteen," replied the agent. "I remember the murder myself. My father was in the real-estate business where I am now. I was a school boy. I remember how the news ran through the village that Martha Penny had been killed by wild Jack Parker, and how I rushed with the crowd to see her. "Yes, ma'am, I saw her lying in her blood across the threshold of the linen closet."

The lady shuddered and sat down in the large, chintz-covered armchair of the room they had entered.

"You can go and play in the garden," she said to the little boy whom she led by the hand. "Don't go out of sight. Now tell me the story, Mr. Brick?"

"Very sensible to send the child away," the agent said. "Well, the facts were these: Martha Penny lived as seamstress with Mrs. Parker. They made her one of the family. Jack fell in love with her. The story goes that she refused him, and that he said that she should never marry any other man. Then she declared that she meant to go away, and she was getting ready to go when she saw him with blazing eyes coming down the passage, and ran into the linen closet. A black servant watched it all. As he passed the door he shot her. They arrested him and took him off to prison. But while the body was waiting for the Coroner it disappeared, no one ever knew how. Mrs. Parker had taken to her bed. Black Ann had been afraid to sit in the room with the murdered girl. In the night Martha Penny's corpse vanished.

"The jury made up their minds that Jack was crazy, and he was locked up awhile, though he swore that the pistol went off by accident. When he was let out again his mother was dead. He is quite a rich man, but he never could bear to live on his property. He has a room at the hotel and has let all the land. At first he let the house also, but the tenants were all scared away by the ghost, they said, so five years ago he boarded up the main building and only let the wing. Every summer people hire it. It is prettily furnished, you see, with new things. They do say that they hear noises in the big building, but probably rats make them. And, Mrs. Smith, you don't look like a lady that who would be afraid of?"—— "Martha Penny's ghost?" interrupted the lady. "Indeed I am not. Poor little Martha would do no one any harm. I should be much more afraid of wild Jack Parker, though he is alive."

"He's an altered man, ma'am," said the agent; "quite broken, though he is rather young in years."

"I'll take the house, Mr. Brick," said the widow, rising and beckoning through the open window to her little boy. "And my servant and I and little Tom will move in on Monday."

They did so, and soon flowers bloomed in the garden and at the window, and the pretty child swung under the elm trees or tossed his ball on the lawn. The mother, reclining in her Mexican hammock, read or crocheted, or walked with her boy when the day grew cool. The maid was pretty and alert. No home in the country seemed less likely to attract ghosts to itself, and Mrs. Smith, when questioned, always said that she had never caught a glimpse of Martha Penny's specter.

But though Mrs. Smith told the truth, she did not tell the whole truth. Sometimes at night—yes midnight—when little Tom and the maid were sound asleep, the lady wrapped in a double gown and with woolen slippers on her feet, would glide out into the hall, and there, with her ear to the light partition that divided the wing from the main building, would listen to feet that went to and fro, to wails and moans, to what seemed to be a prayer, and to many repetitions of the name, "Martha Penny—Martha Penny," but oftenest "Martha" alone. She never spoke of this to any one, and it was plain that she felt no terror, but sometimes she wept bitterly, as if she was very sorry for the poor, wandering ghost.

This went on for months, until one night Mrs. Smith did a strange thing, She arose in the middle of the night and let down the great coil of her brown hair, and braided it in one braid and tied it with white ribbon. She dressed herself all in white and over her head threw a square of tulle. Then she left her house, taking a lantern with her, and stole toward a side door of the main building and tried a key in the lock and entered in.

The place was dry with dust, and dust rolled beneath her feet as she climbed the stairs, and spiders crawled along the balustrades and up the walls. She passed the big chamber and the little chamber, and stopped at the linen closet. Opening the door, she saw piles of clothes and sheets and towels, and pillow cases, once white, but now powdered gray as though a snow of that hue had fallen on them.

She lowered her lantern and beheld across the sill a stain of blood, and within, on the floor, a deeper one; but she did not shudder. Indeed, a smile crossed her face—a pitiful, tender smile.

"Poor little Martha Penny!" she said, and, without a quiver or a cry, she entered in and shut the door behind her. A small, round window, high up in the wall, let in a little gleam of moonlight, a broken pane admitted a breath of air; but amid the woolen blankets at the further end moths burrowed. She could see their tracks, and a curious smell that lingers in moth-eaten wool made the air heavy. Already her lantern's light attracted insects that came through the broken pane above to flutter about it. She closed the slide, and now looked like a very ghost itself—all white in the faint moonlight,

She listened intently. Soon she heard the sound of a door closed carefully, feet upon the stairs, feet in the passage without the door. Some one began to pace slowly up and down.

"Martha!" said a voice; "Martha!" Then there was silence. Then again, "Martha! Martha!"

It was a man's voice which spoke. Now it went on:

"They say your ghost haunts this house. I have come here so often and heard nothing, seen nothing, Martha, give me some sign that you hear me."

The widow lifted her hand and tapped lightly on the door.

There was a little cry without, then "Martha" came again, and now the widow spoke:

"You call Martha. She is here. For once, and once only, she is permitted to listen to you. Who are you?"

"The man who loved you—Jack Parker," replied the voice. "May I see you Martha—angel Martha—may I see you?

"If you swear not to move—not to try to touch me," said the widow.

The door of the linen closet moved slowly. The man on his knees in the passage without saw a white draped figure with long braids of hair hanging below its waist.

"My God!" he panted. "Do I see you again, Martha!"

"I am Martha Penny," replied the widow, in a soft whisper. "Why have you called me?"

"To ask your forgiveness," the man replied. "Without it I am lost in this world and the next. Speak to me, sweet angel; tell me that you know that I did not kill you with intent to do so. Let the world think what it will. Tell me you know it was not so—that you knew it even when you fell there, where you stand now—tell me so and save my soul!"

"When I fell," the faint voice whispered, "when the blood gushed from the wound you gave me I believed that you had shot me purposely. In this belief I lost my consciousness. Yes, when I seemed to die I thought you had killed me."

"But now?" said Jack.

"Oh, unhappy man," replied the spirit, "night after night I have heard your moans; night after night I have heard you swear by all that is holy to your innocence. I do not doubt you now. Be at peace. We shall meet again, and I forgive you."

With a cry the man flung himself upon the floor and the great sobs burst from his bosom.

"At last!" he gasped, "at last. Oh, dear angel, at last. Oh, God be praised!"

"Jack," it said in more earthly tones, "I am so glad that you did not mean to kill me. Poor boy, you were always handling that revolver recklessly, but you know you threatened me. I loved you, Jack, but I could not marry you your mother was so proud, and yet she had been so good to me, a poor little orphan. So I swore to myself that I would go away and never see you again unless she called me back. That is why I refused you, Jack, that is why."

"Certainly I am really mad at last," he said.

But the voice, now even more distinct and full of earthly tenderness, went on:

"No, Jack, no, you are quite sane, quite sane. Remember how the body of poor Martha Penny was spirited away. Have you never thought that perhaps she was not dead, though that stupid old doctor, in his dotage, declared her so? Jack, poor Jack, she was alive. But when she came to herself the horror she felt that you should murder her was very great. And yet she did not wish to give any evidence that would send you to prison. She resolved to fly. The old negress helped her away, and lied to cover the act. Jack, I am no ghost, I am alive, I am flesh and blood. Touch my hand, I give you leave. Poor Jack, poor fellow, how you have suffered all these years."

"As they suffer in Hades," he said, and humbly put his lips to the hem of her robe.

"I worked hard for awhile, then a good old man married me," she went on. "He was kind as a father, and I have a little boy. I am a widow now, and I came back to see the old place. I live in the wing that the agent had to let, and night after night I heard you through the partition, weeping and praying forgiveness of my ghost, swearing you did not mean to harm me. And I meant that you should only think my ghost forgave you. But I—I could not help telling the truth, dear Jack, once I saw you so near me and so broken hearted."

Then indeed, Jack grew bolder and dared to touch her hands and to lift them to his lips. He was thankful and humble, as though heaven had vouchsafed him a vision of angels, and he left her at her door as he might have parted from one. But, after all, she was a living woman, he a man who loved her, and ere the autumn leaves fell they were wed.—Mary Kyle Dallas, in Fireside Companion.

HIS MISTAKE.

The Old Man Got Slightly Mixed up on the Coats.

An old man with a florid face sat in a restaurant the other day talking business with another diner across the table, says the New York Tribune. His coat was hanging on the wall beside him, and he was so earnestly engaged in conversation that when the meal was ended and he was ready to smoke he reached up his hand without looking around and began to feel for the pocket of his overcoat. His hand reached impatiently all over the garment, found the pocket, went down into it and came forth empty. Then the old man searched for the other pocket. This was on the other side of the coat, next to the wall, and it took his straying hand some time to get into it. A look of surprise flashed over his face. He drew forth from his pocket a box of cigarettes. He put them down on the table and looked at them contemptuously.

"Cigarettes," he said, with a sniff. "Cigarettes. Somebody has stolen my cigar-case and left these things in my pocket."

"Cigarettes," he snorted, "The scoundrel! Waiter, waiter," he called his voice rising in anger.

"Yes, sir."

"Who put these things in my pocket and stole my cigars?"

"I don,t know, sir. I'll see about it, sir."

"You should know, you do know."

"Let me look in your pockets, sir; you may be mistaken."

"Don't contradict me. I tell you they're stolen, and some one has put these d—— things in my pocket."

"Let me look in your pocket again, sir. They may be there."

"You shan't look in my pocket. Don't you think I know what's in my pockets and what isn't? Didn't I just go through them? What does this house mean," cried the old man, standing up and shaking his finger threateningly, "by allowing a guest to be treated in this fashion? I'll have you reported, sir. I'll have you discharged." He pushed the box of cigarettes angrily across the table.

"Bring me some cigars," he snapped. As the old gentleman was lighting his cigar another man came up and reached for the coat which was hanging on the peg beside the indignant guest. He got a fierce glance as he took down the coat. The old man got up, his face purple with rage.

"What are you going to do with that coat, sir?" he asked crisply.

"Put it on," answered the other calmly, handing it to a waiter.

"That is my coat, sir."

"I beg your pardon, it is my coat," replied the stranger cooly, slipping his arms through the sleeves.

The old man was in a tremble.

"That is my coat," he shouted. "Take it off."

The stranger's eye caught sight of the box of cigarettes lying on the table.

"Ah," he said, "I see yon have been trying the flavor of my cigarettes. Won't you have another?" he added, smiling.

"Where are my cigars?" cried the furious gentleman.

"I'm sure I don't know," said the stranger quietly. "Perhaps they are in my pocket here. I see the coats are precisely alike. I noticed that when I hung mine beside yours."

"Have a cigar?" he said faintly.

"No, I thank you. I prefer cigarettes."

"Have a drink?"

"No, I thank you, I seldom drink."

"Hang it, waiter!" cried the old gentleman, "bring me my check. Are you going to keep me here all day?"

"Good day, sir," said the stranger.

"Good day," growled the irascible old gentlman.

A moment later the stranger returned.

"Excuse me, sir," he said mildly, "may I have one of my cigarettes?" Just then the old gentleman swore roundly.

It disappears—the worst forms of catarrh, with the use of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It's mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties effect a perfect and permanent cure, no matter how bad the case, or of how long standing. It's a remedy that succeeds where everything else has failed. Thousands of such cases can be pointed out. That's the reason its proprietors back their faith in it with money. They offer $500 reward for a case of catarrh which they cannot cure. It's a medicine that allows them to take such a risk. Doesn't common sense lead you to take such a medicine?

"An advertising fake," you say.

And "faking" doesn't pay.

The Old Man Took a Hand.

An actor told a story recently about a fencing-master in London who had two sons. Both of them, like the father, were physical giants. Who was the strongest and best fighter was a disputed question until a burglar got into the house one night. One of the sons, opened the front door with a latchkey late at night, found a robber in the hall. They immediately clinched. The other brother, heareng the noise, rushed downstairs, and not being able in the dark to distinguish a burglar from a worthy and honest citizen of London, proceeded to pound both men who he ran against. Meanwhile brother No. 1, thinking there was two burglars in the house, turned half of his attention to the new enemy and the fight became desperate, The father, awakened by the uproar, rushed down stairs with a heavy walking stick. Then the fight was something to admire, but to avoid. When it was all over and the gas was lighted by the aged fencing-master, it was discovered that he had whipped not only the burglar but his two sons.

A FARMER at Pennsburg, Pa., has a tame fox that has cleared the rats from his barn, which was formely infested by them. Reynard catches rats after the manner of a terrier, and when not engaged is frequently seen following his master about like a well-behaved canine, to which he bears no little resemblance. He is perfectly tame, and goes about the streets of the town without being molested by the dogs.

Riches are but ciphers; it is the mind that makes the sum.

A Whitewash That Stays Put.

I have found a whitewash that is, however, not exactly pure white, but one that will stick. It may be made as follows: Slake half a bushel of stone lime in hot water. When done, pour in two gallons of clear grease of any kind and hot water enough to thoroughly mix. Finish by adding enough water to make a barrel. For each gallon of the grease a gallon of coal tar may be substituted, with good results. The addition of the grease was suggested by seeing the brief statement somewhere that "potash and grease make soft soap, and soda and grease make soft soap, and lime and grease insoluble soap.' Some tree trunks treated to a whitewash made as above subjected since to three or four heavy rains, retain it like old paint.— Correspondence Country Gentleman.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

Default having been made in the payment of the money secured by a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Newton Bell and Mary E. Bell his wife mortgagors, to Francis W. Noyes, mortgagee, bearing date the 6th day of January, 1883, and, with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds in and for the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, on the 11th day of January, 1883, at 5 o'clock p. m. in book L of mortgages, on pages 212 to 215, and no action or proceeding having been instituted, at law or otherwise, to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof. The amount claimed to be due upon said mortgage at the date hereof, is the sum of five hundred sixty four dollars and twenty-three cents, besides the sum of seventy three and 29-100 dollars for taxes necessarily paid by said mortgagee and interest, and twenty five dollars attorney's fees, stipulated for in said mortgage.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in said mortgage, viz: The northwest quarter of section eight (8) in township onehundred and fifty (150) north, of range forty-four (44) west, containing one hundred and sixty (160) acres more or less according to the government survey thereof, in Polk county, and state of Minnesota, which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk county, or his deputy, at the front door of the court house, in the city at Crookston in said county and state, on the 20th day of June, 1891, at 2 o'clock p. m. of that day.

The justice courts have very little business. Justice Kaufer (who, by the way, still holds his office and will continue to do so till the expiration of his term) is much busier in his harness shop than in the court room.

Nick Schenecker and family, from Day county, Dakota, are in town. They will remain here Mr. Schenecker has rented the store room in the Ralph block, where he will run a hardware store and farm machinery agency in partnership with his brother.

The recent rains have given vegetation a lively boost. Indications now point to a favorable season. Grain is looking well, the slight frosting not having done any material injury. The soil is in first-class condition and could stand a long period of dry weather.

The Wilber House is running full blast. Wm. E. Wilber is catering to the fastidious world in such a manner that entire satisfaction to his patrons is the result. The Wilber is a first-class house. Everything as clean and neat as sapolio and muscle can make it.

It is probable than an excursion party will go from here to Red Lake this summer. The largest body of water in the state, and one of the largest fresh water lakes in the Union, would be a sight worth going a few miles to behold—to say nothing of the incident pleasure of the trip.

Photographer Riecher has taken a view of the first schoolhouse of Red Lake Falls. It is the old tumble down claim shanty near the brewery. What a contrast when our elegant new school building will be completed, and two modern accoutred school houses will grace our city.

About a dozen families will soon arrive to make this city their home. Where are the residences to accommodate them? There is a scarcity of comfortable residence houses and although it may look better thus than to be confronted with vacant houses, it is not a desirable state of affairs.

Assessor Redmund is receiving the undivided blessing of the community about this time as our citizens look at their tax statements for 1890. He is again on deck and will no doubt give the same satisfaction this year. He raised the valuation last year from $250,000 to $350,000, including corporation property that had hitherto been untaxed.

The course of true love never runs smooth. Monday as the passenger was about to leave the true lover saw his case clearly mirrored in the proverb. He next resolved to end his career by simply dividing himself under a car wheel—the wheel over which sat the object of his devotion unmoved, waiting to be hurried away. Thoughtful and sympathetic spectators prevented what might have resulted in a dire tragedy by removing the afflicted individual.

There was a tramp printer in town. Among the many wonderful things he had done off and on were: Catch in a professional base ball nine: sing 1st tenor in a church choir; witnessed the Tribune fire; belonged to three different religious denominations at one time; had beaten Jud Carruth in a roller skating contest; had played in six different bands; was a registered pharmacist and could speak three languages: but he was sick and couldn't spread himself when here.

The Grand Forks papers want a weekly excursion train via Fosston on the Great Northern to Maple Lake. Not a few Grand Forks people availed themselves of that resort last year. Maple Lake becomes more and more popular as it becomes more widely known. A good manager who would build a large hotel, provide a steam yacht and otherwise prepare for the accommodation of visitors, then advertise the resort, would find Maple Lake in a few seasons widely known and patronized by North Minnesotans and Dakotans.

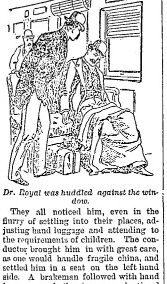
CHAPTER I.



Dr. Royal was huddled against the window.

They all noticed him, even in the flurry of settling into their places, adjusting hand luggage and attending to the requirements of children. The conductor brought him in with great care, as one would handle fragile china, and settled him in a seat on the left hand side. A brakeman followed with hand luggage, and the two men bestirred themselves to make their charge comfortable, lowering the blind to keep the sun from his eyes, folding a railway rug over his knees, and unlocking and turning the seat in front in case he should wish to put up his legs.

When the conductor and his satellite had betaken themselves to their various vocations in other parts of the train, the invalid turned his face to the window and his fellow passengers took note of him. His height was medium, but seemed greater by reason of pallor and emaciation, his eyes had circles under them, and the droop of his figure indicated physical weakness. Evidently a man just out of a serious illness and hardly yet in a condition to travel. At least such was the dictum of the lady on the opposite side, given with emphasis to a girl on the same seat.

"I wonder his people allow him to go about alone," she commented. "It seems positively brutal. He can hardly hold himself upright, and I'm sure the very look of him will keep me racked with anxiety as long as I sit here. He may give up the ghost at any moment."

The girl glanced across. "Perhaps he hasn't any people," she suggested, "or is on his way to them." Then she added sympathetically: "Poor man! he does seem dreadfully ill. I wonder who he can be?"

So did the elder lady—so much, in fact, that, being of decided character and prone to get that which she wanted, were it only information about her fellow creatures, she put questions to the conductor the instant he returned to her vicinity. The facts elicited were few, but they served to deepen her interest and at the same time to divert her thoughts into a more personal channel. The sick man was a Dr. Royal, and on his way to his people somewhere in the mountains of Virginia. He had been badly damaged in a New York railway accident several weeks before, and, although he had escaped with life and limb, it would probably be many months before he would be his own man again. So much the conductor disclosed, in a burst of unofficial confidence which he was made keenly to regret by having to combat womanly fears and prognostications, and also to pledge the honor of a railroad man that no accidents of any size or description had ever occurred in the past, or would be likely to occur in the future, to any train under his administration.

Meanwhile Dr. Royal sat quietly in his place, with his knees well covered and his traveling bag beside him. At intervals he would glance at his watch and administer to himself medicines from bottles which he manipulated with emaciated but steady fingers. From time to time the conductor would come to him with offers of service, but he appeared averse to giving trouble or making a stir in any way, and, on the whole, kept himself so quiet that the interest of the other passengers waned, although each newcomer would treat him to a stare of sympathetic or stolid curiosity, according to each individual nature. And so the day wore on, eventless, into afternoon.

"Gibson's Landing!"

The brakeman dashed open the door of the rear car and sent his voice along the aisle. Nobody evinced other than passing interest, and it was apparent that the information concerned nobody present. The door closed with a bang, and the brakeman stepped back to the platform of the forward car. The engine gave a premonitory toot-toot, the train rolled forward a little way and then came to a standstill. The invalid lifted himself and leaned on the window frame. Away in front he could see the dingy red round of the water tank, and so satisfy himself as to the cause of the delay. He let his eyes wander listlessly here and there over the prospect spread out before him.

It presented the rather poverty stricken aspect of the hill country in December—a stretch of hills in the background, clothed with forest for the most part, but diversified by cliffs and the jutting forth of granite bowlders. At one point, nearly opposite the sick man's window, a red clay road circled and sidled down the hillside to the river at its foot—its objective point, apparently, a small ferry house upon the bank. The embankment on which the track lay was lifted above the low grounds, so that the view was unobstructed to the river, the landing, and the hills beyond.

On the low grounds the corn stalks stood in straggling rows, upright or inclined at various angles according to the wind's good pleasure, and the furrows, surcharged with overplus of moisture, showed long slushy puddles half hidden, half revealed by tangles of cockle burrs, Spanish needles and frostbitten pumpkin and bean vines.

Dr. Royal looked about with dissatisfied recognition in his glance. Six years had made no appreciable change in the aspect of Upper Virginia, he thought. The soil was as good—witness the crop of weeds—the system of cultivation as inadequate, and the general look of things as peacefully thriftless as ever. Had he been gifted with eyes in the back of his head and a focus through the opposite window his opinion would have been fully borne out by the dilapidation of the buildings near the station, the stretch of broomsedge and sassafras covered land around, and the joyous improvidence of a couple of negro boys who, with apples to sell and a trainful of possible customers at hand, suffered themselves to be seduced into inattention to business by a dog fight.

Debarred from this additional evidence, there was still enough within the sick man's range of vision to produce a feeling of discouragement which, in a well man, fresh from different conditions, might have developed into exasperation.

"Even the roads are as bad as ever," he mused, glancing along the track which led across the low grounds to the broad opening on the willow fringed bank of the river.

In an instant his attention was arrested by a boat nearing the bank—a long, unwieldy, flat bottomed affair, presumably the ferryboat—guided and propelled by a couple of negroes with long poles. In the end of the boat nearest the shore sat a man on horseback. His reins were gathered up, his body bent slightly forward, and his knees clamped the sides of his horse. Even from a distance there was an alertness, an eager precipitation, perceptible in his air and attitude.

"That fellow wants to make the train," quoth the passenger occupying the seat just behind Dr. Royal. "He can't, though—without wings. They must be about through watering. Great Scott! what a jump! Standing jump, too. I'll bet a hat that's a fox hunter."

"No, he won't!"

"Here he comes—pelting!"

"There goes the engine—confound it!"

These and other comments flew about the car, and every neck was craned for a better view.

As the boat neared the bank the horseman had lifted his steed, touched him with the whip, and cleared the remaining feet of water at a bound. The horse staggered and slipped, his hind legs splashing into the water, but recovered himself with the vigor and address of an animal used to rough scrambling, and, laying back his ears and stretching his limbs, raced forward toward the station and the train. Excitement thrilled through the car. All the windows on the side next the river were open, and heads were thrust out with the faces set in one direction. Exclamations, conjectures, contradictions and offers of bets passed freely; the passengers on the eventless side stood in the aisle and bent forward, striving to peer over the shoulders of their more fortunate companions. Fifty yards—thirty—fifteen—one more effort, and he would make it! In their eagerness the men hung far out of the windows and prepared to cheer.

The engine was getting up steam—vibrating and twitching; the conductor, unwitting of the excitement, waved his hand to the engineer the cars were in motion—he had been left behind! he had missed it, after all!

By no means. There he stood on the rear platform, swaying with the motion of the train and gazing back to where his horse stood, like a statue, in the middle of the track. How had he managed it? Everybody questioned everybody else, and a man who stood with his face flattened against the glass of the end door supplied the information that it had been "a regular circus."

As the train moved the horse had bounded on the track close behind it, the rider had thrown himself from the saddle, caught the handrail, and, with a swerve and spring worthy of his quadrumanous ancestors, had landed himself on the step of the platform. It had been a reckless thing to do, rash and foolhardy; but the success of the feat appeared to modify its risk in the minds of the spectators and leave room for nothing but admiration of its agility. That is, everybody applauded except the inquisitive lady whose imagination had been set working along accident lines earlier in the day, who observed with asperity that "men might consider that sort of thing fine and spirited, but it was not. It was idiotic foolishness, and its legitimate reward should be a cell and a straight jacket."

The horse, satisfied with his inspection of the retreating train, whinnied loudly, kicked up his heels as one who exults in past prowess, and trotted down the embankment toward the stalk field, oblivious alike of duty and the alluring calls and whistles of the negro advancing toward him from the ferry. The train rounded a bend, and the gentleman on the platform turned and tried the handle of the car door. It was locked, as the passengers had discovered to their annoyance quite early in the action, and by the time the conductor came along and opened it matters had relapsed into a normal condition in the car, and the newcomer was allowed to find himself a seat without other comment than curious glances.

He was a muscular, broad shouldered man, with a clean shaven face, blue-gray eyes, a brown mustache and close cut hair. His clothes were trim and set to his figure, his linen was above reproach and his hat the regulation structure with which fashion had crowned the male populace; but there was that about him, whether in the capable look of the hand and forearm, the alert glance and decisive movements, or all taken together, which caused the beholder, involuntarily, to strip from him civilized accessories, invest his sturdy frame with flannel and corduroy, clap a pistol in the rear pocket of his trousers, a horse between his knees, and set him on a prairie with a lariat on the saddle peak, a storm growling along the horizon, and an unruly bunch of cattle close at hand. The man's whole atmosphere suggested action and ability to cope with physical forces.

The place he selected was directly behind that occupied by Dr. Royal, and he slipped out of his overcoat and threw it across the back of the seat with the gesture of a man who considers the garment a superfluity. As he settled himself he opened his window, letting a rush of cold air into the car.

For half an hour the monotony was unbroken save by the usual trivialities of travel. Then the newcomer bent forward and scrutinized the man in front of him intently, muttered an exclamation that sounded like "the devil!" rose and came swiftly round to the adjoining seat. Dr. Royal was huddled against the window with his head dropped forward on his breast, apparently asleep, but when the stranger lifted him gently into a more comfortable position and turned his face to the light its pallor was ghastly and the eyes had a semi-conscious expression of pain.

"Has anybody got a pillow?—and another rug?" The young man raised his voice and looked about him, reaching over at the same time for his own overcoat.

With instant helpfulness both articles were supplied, a woman depriving her sleeping child of its pillow. The tide of sympathetic interest set toward the sick man once more, and even the lady opposite rose superior to the natural exultation of a prophetess whom the event has justified, and tendered her shawl and a tiny silver flask with no thought save for the sufferer's relief. The conductor hurried forward followed by a brakeman with some bits of board, procured in the baggage car, which they laid across the seats and heaped with rugs and overcoats, improvising as comfortable a resting place as circumstances would permit. The train was a local, and had no sleeper attached. The conductor seemed troubled, and repeated the story he had given earlier in the day.

"The fellow has no business traveling," he averred impatiently. "He's been badly smashed up, and is only just out of the hospital. He seems in the devil of a hurry to get where he's going to. A brother Mason handed him over to me this morning, with orders to look after him and help him all I could. He seems to need taking care of, if ever a man did."

"Is he a Mason?" questioned a bystander, then added, superfluously, "How do you know he is?"

"How do you know I'm a man?" was the sharp counter query.

The passenger stared.

"The signs point that way, don't they?" pursued the conductor, elaborating from sheer vexation with the other's inconsequence. "Well, I'm a Mason myself, and that gentleman was given into my charge by a Mason, as I said before, and he's got the badge of the order pinned on his breast. That's as good evidence as a beard and trousers, I reckon. It passed, anyway."

There was a smile at the questioner's expense. The young man bending over the invalid moved his coat aside and glanced at the badge on his breast. He had been working away with professional skill and promptitude, and his instant assumption of authority and responsibility, as well as his evident ability to cope with the situation, suggested in the minds of the other passengers a surmise that he was practicing within his own bailiwick even before an abrupt announcement changed conjecture into certainty.

"We all thought," the lady across the aisle commenced, then paused, smiling.

"That I was a ranchman? Everybody makes that mistake, madam. I come from out there, and doubtless have a look of the plains, so it's very natural. Ranching isn't my trade, however. I'm Dr. Hart Royal."

The sick man's eyes opened; his mind was torpid, but struggled to perform its functions. His lips moved and he muttered slowly: "That is my name, sir. Who wants me?"

Dr. Royal No. 2 was bending forward with his fingers on the sufferer's wrist, his ear inclined for the feeble words. He straightened himself, a trifle puzzled; then his expression changed to one of half quizzical amusement. He had known very ill men before to acknowledge their own names; even in a semi-conscious condition a name is a mental anchor. The sick man's traveling bag stood open near at hand, and in it was a silver brandy flask. Royal turned it so as to read the name engraved on the side, then his hand went to his pocket for his own flask. They differed in size and in other trifling particulars, but both flasks were labeled with the same name—John Hart Royal. It was a queer coincidence. Dr. Royal felt it so, and regarded his namesake with a whimsical sense of confused identity. He wondered whether they could resemble each other.

The other man lay with his white face and closed eyes thrown vividly out by the dull red background of the seat. Beyond the facts that both men were of medium height and had brown hair and mustaches and blue-gray eyes, there was no resemblance whatever. Even in health the face on the pillow must have differed

THE late Utopia disaster has set an Italian statistician thinking. He calculates that in seventeen shipping disasters which occurred within one hundred years, 6,030 persons have lost their lives. This death roll does not include any of the minor wrecks, in which "toilers of the sea" have gone down to a watery grave.

A MONTANA business man says the drouth in that State last year caused a loss to it of $8,000,000. Fully $4,000,000 had to be paid out for agricultural articles ordinarily raised in the State, while the placer mining output was reduced an equal amount. The outlook for the present year is exceedingly bright.

THE Boston board of health has refused the application of a young medical student for a permit to serve as an undertaker. THE lightning performed two unusual feats at the house of Nelson Vergason near Norwich, Conn. It cut half an inch off the rim of an inverted goblet on a table and left the goblet sitting as it found it. This work is said to have been done with a diamond. IT is whispered about that Lord Tennyson sells the milk from his cows on the Isle of Wight. This ought not to take anybody's breath away. His cows are probably the only animals he raises whose milk has a commercial value. You couldn't expect the author of "Idylls of the King" to peddle goat's milk from a handcart. It was probably after he had been out on an early milk delivering tour that he penned those lines "To Sleep."

KING OTTO of Bavaria is slowly approaching his end. The melancholy malady from which he has been suffering for years has entered its final stage, the brain is softening, and the patient is so hopelessly bedridden as to render the recovery of bodily powers absolutely impossible. The saddest part of the affair is that the doctors agree that, owing to his wonderful constitution, the unfortunate man may live for months, perhaps a year.

THE Emperor William is enraged at the conversion to the Greek Church of the Duchess of Sparta, which he attributed to Russian influences working through Queen Olga. The Emperor regards his sister's change of faith as a personal insult to himself, for it seems it was by his express order that the clause was introduced into the marriage contract which allowed the duchess to continue a member of the Lutheran Church. It is now said that his Majesty would have refused to consent to the alliance if he had not felt assured that the duchess would retain the religion of her family.

PLUNGED INTO FIRE.

A Horrible and Fatal Accident Happens to a Pennsylvavia Logging Railroad.

It is Thrown From the Track Into the Midst of a Great Pile of Burning Logs.

COUDERSPORT, Pa., May 13.—To-night the pretty little lumber and farming towns of Austin, Costello, Galeton and Moore's Run, in Potter county, are on the verge of a panic, two especially being threatened with annihilation from fires that seem to form an impenetrable wall on every side.

For several days past the skies have been lighted up with fires apparently in every direction. But little fears were entertained by people living in the towns, as those threatened and in danger were farmers in the country districts, or lumber camps in the midst of the blazing forests. In spite of every effort, however, the flames crept steadily in snaky lines of smoke and flame toward the helpless towns until it was seen the people must fight back the flames or have their very houses burned down over their heads.

At Moore's run, on the Sinnemahoning Valley road, a train load of seventy-five willing men sent out from Austin Sunday night had been fighting back the fire by every conceivable means. They made trenches, piled up earth, and lighted back-fires, but were finally obliged to retreat.

The men hastily boarded the train, and started to make a run to another point, when it was found they were hemmed in by the forest fire on one side and on the other. It was finally decided to dash past the burning skidway, and the engineer and fireman, with faces covered with dampened cloths and their hands and arms wrapped in wool, mounted the little engine and pulled out through the wall of fire. The seventy-five exhausted men gathered in groups on the flats for protection, or lay on their faces on the floor. As the blazing furnace of logs was approached the heat became unbearable, and the smoke so blinding and stifling the men were obliged to cover their mouths with cloths.

Just opposite the millions of feet of burning logs, where the heat and smoke and flame were the greatest, a terrible thing occurred. The engineer had forgotten that such great heat would surely spread the rails, and he pulled the throttle wider in the hope of sooner escaping from a torment of heat and smoke. Then there was a lurch, an ominous heaving, and a shriek of despair as the train toppled over into the hell of fire beneath.

A scene ensued never to be forgotten by those who escaped, though every man will bear to his grave a mark of that awful moment. The cars caught fire like so many paper playthings, and the men within, half blinded and scarcely realizing anything except that they were being slowly struggling fearfully to regain the track, where safety lay for a time at least. Those uninjured from the fall, and only smarting from the pain of intense heat, bravely turned their burned, blackened hands to aid their more unfortunate fellows.

At this hour it is impossible to secure details, though enough is known of the scene that followed the hurling of the struggling mass of men into the furnace of flames to say that its like had never occurred before.

Supt. Badger, of the Sinnemahoning Valley road, was in charge of the relief train, and had worked the hardest of all to save the properties of others. When the train was ditched and rolled over so suddenly he must have been injured so as to be unable to help himself, and, owing to the smoke and panic, he was not found until too late. Jammed in the wreck, he had evidently burned to death.

At this time—9:30 p. m.—it is known that six others also miserably perished at once, or died soon after, and thirty others of the party were badly burned, many probably fatally, owing to fears that they inhaled the flames that seemed to fairly spring into their faces. Seven others of the party are missing and their fate is unknown, though they are likely in the charred wood of the logs or train.

started for the scene as soon as the fearful news spread, many male relatives of the men injured insisting on accompanying the train, though they will hardly be able to reach the place of the wreck unless the fires have burned themselves out.

Owing to the great devastation done to everything in the way of the fire communication is badly interrupted, and it is impossible to learn the names of the men burned or those still missing.

As to the damage, it is known 40,000,000 feet of hemlock logs and timber and 25,000 cords of valuable bark have already been destroyed, and the fires are raging without any appreciable diminution.

This evening the people are praying for rain, as it seems nothing but a drenching will quench the flames that have grown so fierce they must either be extinguished by the floods of heaven or burn out for lack of material.

The timber lands are owned by Goodyear Bros. of Buffalo and are situated in Potter, McKean and Tioga counties, and cover about 108,000 acres. The firm's extensive sawmills are located at Austin and are capable of turning out 4,000,000 feet of lumber per day. The Goodyears built the Sinnemahoning Valley railroad some years ago to carry their lumber to the Western New York and Pennsylvania roads.

SHOT HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW.

Then He Sent a Bullet Through His Head.

LE MARS, Iowa, Special Telegram, May 13.—Thomas Saunders, a farmer living twelve miles south of Le Mars, came to town this morning and shot his mother-in-law, Mary A. Lidster, and then shot himself through the head. The woman will recover.

Saunders' wife walked home to her mother, twelve miles, Saturday night, after a stormy scene with her husband. He blamed the mother-in-law for the domestic trouble. The coroner's jury declared Saunders insane. The widow and five children are left in good circumstances.

FIRED ON STRIKERS.

DENVER, Colo., May 13.—A desperate fight took place in City Park to-day between F. N. Davis and Ed Gavis (white). and John White, Tom Davis, E. Farris, J. W. Smith and J. Blackburn (colored). on one side and fifty or more strikers on the other. Two men were fatally shot and about twelve more wounded, more or less seriously. The fight, which was at close range, was brought about by the brickmakers' strike, which has been in progress at the Davis yards for several weeks past. This morning F. N. Davis and son, proprietors of the brick, with eight negroes, with double-barreled shot guns, heavily loaded with buckshot, started for the yards with the avowed intention of beginning work or dying in the attempt. As they were nearing the yards a party of strikers, headed by Frank Surber, appeared. Davis ordered the strikers to allow his men to pass. This this the strikers would not do, and Davis and son five men opened fire on the strikers. Thomas Kelly was shot in the small of the back and died two hours after.

Kelly was not a striker, and only went to the place out of mere curiosity. John Ridenour was also mortally wounded, and was taken to the Sisters' hospital in a dying condition. W. J. Shamet, who was one of the injured, said:

"We were sitting under the trees when Davis and his party came up with their guns on their arms. Mr. Surber said: 'Mr. Davis, we would like to talk to these men.' Davis replied: 'We want no talking.' Then he shouted, 'Fire!' and emptied his gun at the strikers. When poor Ridenour fell, young Davis shot him again after he was down." A number of men who were present at the time corroborated the story of Shamul.

The men about the park say that in addition to the men who were shot two little boys who were crossing the street at the time were hit by stray shot, but neither was fatally hurt.

FEW TAILS' MURDER.

It Is to Be Investigated by the Meade County Grand Jury.

STURGIS. S. D., Special Telegram, May 13.—The regular session of the Meade county circuit court opens here to-morrow. This session is of more than ordinary interest, as the signs indicate that the case of the slayers of Few Tails, the Indian killed last winter on Alkali creek by certain settlers, will be brought before the grand jury.

Deputy United States Marshal Matthieson arrived here yesterday from the Pine Ridge agency with Few Tails' widow and young daughter, as well as other Indian witnesses, to testify in the case. The squaw of Few Tails, it will be remembered, was severely wounded at the time of the affray, and made her way more dead than alive across the snow-covered prairies toward the agency, a distance of over ninety miles. She is now a cripple for life.

Attorney General Miller has instructed United States District Attorney Sterling of this state to appear here and assist our state's attorney in the proceedings. Mr. Sterling arrived this morning. The probabilities are that a most interesting case will be heard here, even rivaling the trial of Plenty Horses at Sioux Falls.

A BLOODY FIGHT.

Three Men Killed and Five Others Fatally Injured.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., May 13.—Details of a murderous affray which occurred on Wolf creek, near the North Carolina line, have been received here.

Jonathan Bell, an old and well-to-do man, the head of a mountain family, lost his wife by death six weeks ago. After two weeks he married a girl of seventeen, greatly to the disgust of his family. As time passed they grew more dissatisfied, and finally they went in a body to the old man's house, and taking the young wife out, stripped her and gave her 100 lashes.

On the following day, on complaint of the elder Bell and John Ballew, the white cappers were arrested, but released on bonds. They went to Ballew's house to punish him for interfering. Ballew and his family resisted, and in the battle which followed John Bell was killed, "Big" and "Wild Bill" Bell, Hiram Morton, Jack Johnson and three others were fatally shot. Johnson and "Big" Bell have since died, and it is said others are dying. There have been no arrests, and both sides are armed for more warfare.

A LIVELY CONTEST

Going on for the Location of an Indian Industrial School.

BLACK RIVER FALLS, Wis., Special, May 13. The Indian commissioner is to establish somewhere in this state an industrial school for the Winnebago Indians, and there is at present a lively contest going on between this and Shawano counties to secure its location.

A very large percentage of the Winnebagos reside in this county, and many o them have comfortable houses and are nearer the verge of civilization than they are elsewhere. There are also many pleasant associations and traditions of the tribe especially calculated to make this acceptable to Indians as the location of such a school. Black river has always had strong attractions for them, and especially as along its bank was the old camping grounds and battle fields of the famous old chief, Dakorah, whose name will live as long as the history of the tribe.

The citizens are largely petitioning the commissioner to locate the school somewhere in this county, as good farming lands can be obtained at very reasonable rates for the farm to be used in connection with it.

ST. PAUL, Minn., May 13.—Hon. John W. Roche, for over a quarter of a century city controller of St. Paul, dropped dead on a Selby avenue cable train.

Mistakes Will Happen.

In the rush and hurry of putting together a newspaper mistakes occur far less frequently than might reasonably be expected, but once in a while something comes up to show what is only prevented daily by the closest care. Here, for instance is the Boston Herald, a paper that is usually carefully made up, describing a man as follows:—

He is over 6 feet tall, straight and broad-shouldered. He looks to be about 55 years old. His most prominent feature is his nose, which was enormous, and the conduct of the women execerable and scandalous.

Then on another page of the same paper we read:—

There was a perfect mob of people, principally women and young girls, strangers to the dead and to the family, but who crushed into the house to get a sight at the furnishings upon which money had been lavished without stint. The crown is large and sharply acquiline. His eyes are blue and penetrating and his beard, which is sprinkled with gray, is worn Burnside fashion and rather long. He is a very smooth and easy talker.

Let anybody read these two paragraphs carefully, and he will be pretty sure to read them again and gasp as he does it.—Hartford Courant.

Shaving With Both Hands.

There are lots of barbers who won't hire a man who cant shave himself with either hand. Of the people who shave themselves, forty-nine out of fifty can hold their razors in but one hand. Yet it is just as easy and much more convenient to shave the right side of your face with your right hand and the left side with the left hand if you only begin that way. No two men who shave themselves, do the work alike, especially if they took it up before going to a barber. I know a wealthy man who shaves himself standing in the corner of his room and facing the wall. In youth he was a poor country, boy, and, like most boys, bought a razor on the quiet. But he had no looking-glass in his chamber, and rather than let his folks know what he was up to, he faced the wall and scraped away by sense of feeling. Once learned that way, he never had use for a glass. I knew an old farmer in the country who shaved himself sitting on a milking-stool, and looking at his reflection in a bucket of water. That was the way he learned when a boy, and he said he couldn't shave himself standing up.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Kate Could Not Eat the Salad,

Kate Chase Sprague tells this story of a visit to old Gen. Winfield Scott, at Cozzen's West Point: "He gave us seats at his own especial table, and was very kind to us, but I was terribly afraid of him. One of his greatest pleasures at the table was to mix the most fiery of salads, which he would send by his own man (who always stood behind his master's chair) with the general's compliments, to the favored few. My gastronomic tastes were far from being developed, and the old gentleman's red pepper and mustard nearly killed me. I simply could not eat the burning stuff. Feeling the general's eye upon me, I vainly tried to swallow it, but failed ignominiously, with tears coming into my eyes with the effort. To add to my discomfort and mortification, a voice roared out in a deep tone from the general's throne: "The little Chase does not like my salad."

A Romance of the Census.

"Madam," said the grateful census enumerator, "you have replied courteously and kindly to all my questions. Unlike nearly every person I have met since I began this work, you have not treated me as if I were an enemy and an intruder. You have answered satisfactorily all the questions as to age, physical condition and ownership of property. Your conduct meets my hearty approval not only as a Government officer but as a citizen, and with your permission I will ask you a question not down in my list. "Are you engaged to be married to anybody?" "I am, sir," replied the handsome widow, blushing. "I feared so," said the census taker, with a sigh. And he put on his hat and went out into the cold world again, his faith in human nature restored, but his heart broken.—Exchange.

Self-Identifying Offspring.

There is a negro woman living out in the country near Waynesboro Ga., who has queer ideas as to the naming of children. Instead of bestowing upon them the Bibical names so popular with the Afro-American citizen, she has developed a nomenclature from their physical peculiartics. For instance, one has very thick lips, and his name is Lips; another has very big feet, and he is called Foots; another is blessed with a pair of bowed legs, and he is known as Crooks. She gives as a reason that as there are so many of them she could not remember the ordinary names, but as they are, she has only to look at them and she knows what to call them.—Atlanta Constitution.

Electricity is employed in a Berlin cafe to boil coffee. A platinum wire passes in spiral form through several glass jars, the electrical current quickly raising the water contained to a boiling point, and the coffee is thus prepared in the view of any one in the room. A small electric railway conveys the coffee to the several tables, so that the guests may help themselves to their liking.

"GIVING OUR MARKETS."

THE SHALLOWNESS OF THE RECIPROCITY IDEA.

We Trade for Our Own Good—We Enrich Ourselves by What We Get in Exchange—"Reciprocity" Good, but Must Be Wider—Thoughts for Farmers.

A shrewd Yankee shoe manufacturer endorses reciprocity for the reason that "it will open up for us markets, without our being compelled to give for them, as a price, markets well and cheaply supplied by our own labor."

But when we "give our markets," we do not do so to accommodate other people, but ourselves. The pretense that in putting sugar, for instance, upon the free list we are doing a great favor to Cuba is a piece of transparent hypocrisy. We put sugar on the free list because we Americans want cheap sugar.

"Giving our markets" by removing duties is precisely like the citizens of some isolated town going to work to build a railroad in order to put themselves in communication with the outside world—they "give their market" and get a market. The market which they get adds to their source of wealth, but in "giving their market" they do not take one penny from their wealth. On the contrary, they grow richer by opening their market to outsiders. The "give their market" in order to get goods into it; and surely these goods are a blessing, else the citizens of the town were great fools in building their railroad.

Pursuing this analogy further, if these citizens should take up Republican notions about protection and reciprocity, and should determine that their "market" was too valuable a thing to "give away," they could easily protect that precious market and make it harder for outside goods to come in, by passing a law that all in-coming trains should consist of only two cars, that they should not run above ten miles an hour, and that there should be only one such train a day. Of course they build their railroads in order to get goods as well as to sell them, and these regulations would merely defeat the object they had in view in building the road; yet such regulations are an exact parallel to the whole protection system. Duties are levied on foreign goods in order to render the home market more or less inaccessible. The same thing could be accomplished by compelling all steamship companies to use steamers only half as large as those now in use, to make their trips less frequently, or to remain anchored five days outside our harbors before landing.

Such is protection, and such the false notions on which reciprocity rests. Yet for all that, there is no man in the United States doing more to undermine the protection system than Blaine with his reciprocity treaties. Those treaties, if they increase our foreign trade, will only make it plainer to the people that in "giving away our markets" we are gainers and not losers.

Moreover, what are to be the limits of reciprocity? It was first intended to be purely an American affair—a thing for "sister republics." But already it has crossed the Atlantic and has taken in monarchical Spain. Where shall the thing end? If it is good to trade with one country, why is it not good to trade with any other country? If trade is to be freer with Spain, why not cross the Pyrenees and make it freer with France? Why not cross the Channel and make it freer with England?

But all this is strong meat for the backers of reciprocity. They look back with a timid concern to the home market, fearing lest we "give away" that market—"the best market in the world." They are like the farmer who should decide that he would not open his "market"—for every farmer is a market—to more than one manufacturer of plows or wagons or cloth or sugar. The simplest-minded farmer in the country knows that it is best for him to open his little market as widely as possible to all the manufacturers of plows, in order that they may bid against each other and so reduce the price of plows; ditto of wagons, cloth, sugar, and all other commodities.

"Competition is the life of trade," says the old adage, and in order that there may be competition there must be open markets.

American and English Shoe-Making.

The London Boot and Shoe Trades Journal gives an interview with a Mr. A. Harden, an American who is in England for the purpose of introducing American shoe-making machinery there. This Mr. Harden makes some statements which should be read with interest in this country.

The London journal says: "Invited to give his opinion upon our systems and quality of work produced, he expressed himself as considerably surprised at the high degree of excellence attained by the mixed up methods now prevailing here, and candidly admitted that there was little to be desired in the latter respect, but in the former he considered we were just about in the same position as the Americans were about twenty years ago; but he could observe that many of the manufacturers were of a progressive type, and with the facilities afforded by the numerous, large and well-appointed factories we should rapidly overtake his countrymen, the two things necessary being the adoption of good machines and systems and the cooperation of the workmen. The workmen in America had learned that machinery was beneficial to them and to the whole community. It dispensed with a great portion of manual labor, the men using brains instead. It also meant to them higher wages and shorter hours, to the manufacturer increased profits, and to the community at large the advantages accruing by the cost of production being lessened, thereby superior goods could be bought at even reduced prices, and so increasing the consumption to such an extent that hand labor could not cope with the demand, and he was certain our workmen would speedily become cognizant of the above advantages."

If the system of shoe manufacturing in England is twenty years behind ours, where is the need for our 25 per cent. duty on boots and shoes? Certainly it is not necessary to protect labor, for, as Mr. Hardon points out, our machinery gives the laborer an advantage over his foreign competitor.

In a late number of the Boston Boot and Shoe Recorder its Brockton (Mass.) correspondent reports that an Englishman had been in that city and had said that he found labor cheaper there than in England. Brockton is the largest boot and shoe manufacturing center in the United States, and it is claimed by the correspondent just quoted that wages are higher there than in other places in New England and the West. Ex-Consul Schoolcraft is authority for the statement that a pair of shoes costing 35 cents to make in this country costs 60 to make in England, this being due to the greater use of machinery here and to the greater efficiency of our labor. What becomes, then, of the claim that our laborers in boot and shoe factories need protection from foreign competition?

Still Humbugging Labor.

At the recent protectionist banquet in New York one Mr. George Gunton, who plumes himself upon being a political economist, made a speech in which he said:

"Are wage laborers benefited by protection, then is the question. If they are not, there is no economic, social or political defense for a protective policy. I for one am willing that the merits of the protective policy shall stand or fall by this test."

In answer to this challenge may be quoted the following list, giving but a few cases of wage reductions in protected industries made within about a month before these words were spoken.

The twelve manufacturers of brick in Trenton, N. J., gave notice on April 5 that the wages of their employes would be reduced 20 per cent. on the following day. On April 6 the workmen, 1,200 in number, went on strike against the reduction.

A reduction of 20 cents per thousand in the cigarette factory of David Billor, in this city, caused a strike on March 26.

In Lehigh, Iowa, 100 miners went on strike April 3 because of a reduction from $1 to 86 cents per ton.

The wages of engravers and chasers at the Middletown (Conn.) Plate Company's establishment have been reduced 15 per cent.

The men employed in Requardi's cigar factory, Baltimore, were on strike April 9 against a reduction of from $1 to $2 per thousand.

Twenty-seven finishers employed at Solomon's leather factory in Newark struck, on April 10, against a threatened reduction of 14 per cent.

Forty ribbon weavers at Frank & Dugan's silk mill in Paterson, N. J., went on strike, April 20, against a reduction of 75 cents per cut. This was the third reduction in two weeks.

The employes of the New Haven Rolling Mill Company, in New Haven, Conn., went on strike, April 6, owing to a reduction of 10 per cent.

On March 31, the weavers at the gingham mills of the Fitchburg Manufacturing Company, at West Fitchburg, struck because the firm refused to pay them a uniform rate of three cents per yard on all grades of goods.

When is protection going to make labor contented and happy?

A "Revival" Promised.

When is protection ever to "do its work?" We have now had high tariff for thirty years, and still protectionists are busy making promises that protection is going to make the country prosperous. President Harrison said to the people of San Francisco:

"I feel that we have come to a point where American industries, American commerce and American influence are to be revived and extended."

American ship building has had for years absolute protection in the shape of laws entirely forbidding the purchase of foreign ships; and despite this absolute protection the President has to confess that, so far as ocean shipping is concerned, we have already gone out of business.

But even the President, hide-bound protectionist that he is, is making progress away from McKinleyism. In his speeches on the tariff in the House of Representatives last year McKinley asked contemptuously, "Why need we vex ourselves about foreign commerce?" He praised his bill for the very reason that it would "diminish the importation of competing foreign goods;" and there was applause on the Republican side of the House.

But lo, what a change in one brief year! Here is our President going about the country telling the people that American industries are at the point of being "revived" since the billion Congress has voted subsidies to ships for the purpose of increasing our foreign trade. McKinley erects his wall and frankly tells us that it is for the purpose of reducing imports.

McKinley bill and subsidy bill are both passed, the one to kill trade the other to "revive" it; and they are both signed by the same President! It is all very amusing.

American Locomotives.

The Railway Gazette says:

"German locomotives are said to cost, on an average, $11,000 each. Our native establishments would be overjoyed at such prices. It has not, we believe, been questioned that the Americans can produce better as well as cheaper engines. The closer the comparison between the railway systems of this country and the old world the more reason we have to be proud of the skill of our artisans and the progressive spirit of our manufacturers."

Last year the Baldwin Locomotive Works, of Philadelphia, built locomotives for the new railway between Jaffa and Jerusalem, in Palestine. It was to this fact that one of the speakers at the late protectionist banquet in New York referred when he triumphantly exclaimed: "It is due to this policy [protection] that the ruins of the ancient world vibrate with the shrieks of a Philadelphia locomotive."

Not long ago a ship steamed out from Philadelphia with an entire cargo of Baldwin locomotives bound for Australia. Last year we exported 161 locomotives, valued at $1,280,000, or slightly less than $8,000 apiece.

Facts like these certainly prove that we are abundantly able to manufacture locomotives in competition with all the world. Yet what does Major McKinley do? He put a duty of 1.8 cents per pound on all locomotives. This means a duty of $40.32 per ton, or a total duty of $1,128 on a standard passenger locomotive weighing twenty eight tons.

There is absolutely no need and no excuse for this duty. The only purpose it can serve is to enable the few manufacturers of locomotives to keep up prices in the home market at the same time that they are selling their locomotives in successful competition with all the world.

SILLY people, who are still asking whether the tariff is a tax, can find an answer in the fact that granulated sugar is now selling in the United States at from 4⅛ to 4⅜ cents per pound, while just across the border in Canada, the price is seven cents. The difference, you see is just this: Canada has a duty of 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem on refined sugar.

Is the tariff a tax?

SINCE Germany undertook to protect itself from American pork by an absolutely prohibitory law, the prices of all kinds of hog-meats have advanced 40 to 60 per cent. in that country. Meantime Germany's imports of our hog products have fallen from $11,000,000 in 1881, to a very low figure last year, excepting the single item of lard, which is still imported under a duty of about 1 cent per pound. Aside from lard, Germany took from us last year only a little more than $200,000 worth of hog-meats.

THE TWINE TRUST.

THE MANUFACTURE OF BINDER TWINE STILL INCREASES.

Opening of an Immense Factory in Brooklyn, N. Y.—Lower Duties Have Not Hurt the Twine-Makers — False Representations to Get Higher Duties.

The following item has recently appeared in a New York trade journal: "The American Manufacturing Co., which consists of the various mills comprising the jute trust, has just completed and will in a few days begin to operate its new mill at Brooklyn, N. Y. Its capacity is said to be 860,000,000 pounds annually of rope, binder twine and bagging."

Here we have the binder-twine industry flourishing like a green bay tree, although the twine men were filling the air with prophecies of blue ruin last year when the reduction of duty was proposed. The original McKinley bill passed the House of Representatives and was sent to the Senate on May 21. On the 26th of May the following statement was sent to the Senate Finance Committee by the binder-twine manufacturers:

> SIR—The cordage and binder-twine manufacturers of the United States beg that your honorable committee will amend that clause in the tariff bill which relates to our business. It places a duty of 1¼ cents per pound upon binder twine. Should this become a law it will close our mills. We ask for 1¾ cents per pound, an increase of one-half cent.

In September came the effort to put binder twine on the free list, which was at first successful in the Senate by reason of the Northwestern Republican Senators voting with the Democrats. When, however, the bill was in conference committee, the trust made a determined fight for the restoration of the duty. In this fight the trust was strongly supported by the high tariff New York Tribune, which spoke of the effort to put twine on the free list "in the interest of the farmer," as being "as shallow and indecent a pretext for a raid upon a legitimate industry as was ever made by political bushwhackers of either party."

This foolish defense of the trust was made by the high tariff organ, notwithstanding the fact that Senator Davis of Minnesota had shown in his speech in the Senate that the trust was squeezing profits of 40 per cent. a year out of the farmers. In the face of this fact the organ went on to say that "to put binder twine on the free list is so probably out of harmony with all the principles of protection as to be almost an absurdity in the pending bill." Another organ which came to the aid of the Tribune in defending the trust was the Manufacturer, the mouthpiece of the powerful protectionist organization in Philadelphia known as the Manufacturers' Club.

As the result of this squabble over binder-twine a compromise was made by the Republicans in the conference committee. Twine made of istle, Tampico fiber, sisal grass or sunn bore a duty under the old law of 3¼ cents per pound, and that made of manila a duty of 2½ cents. These duties were respectively equal to 27 and 22 per cent. ad valorem. The duty on both classes was made 7-10 of 1 cent per pound. The old duty on jute twine was 35 per cent; this was reduced to 1½ cents per pound.

The cordage trust had said that the duty of 1¼ cents per pound would close their mills and asked for 1¾ cents. They did not get it, but got only 7-10 of a cent on manila and sisal twine Did the trust then close their mills? On the contrary, within a week or two after the McKinley law went into operation, it issued a prospectus which was advertised in many of the leading newspapers, in which it was said that—

"The annual aggregate profits of the several concerns for the past ten years have been more than enough to pay the annual dividend on the preferred stock and leave a very large surplus, notwithstanding the fact that during some of that period the interests now consolidated were in competition of a character now avoided.

"The committee further certifies that at no time within the past twenty-five years have the aggregate annual profits of the several concerns been insufficient to pay the 8 per cent. dividend on the preferred stock, although the consumption of cordage at the beginning of that period was only one-quarter what it is to-day."

And now comes the report of the completion of the jute trust's enormous factory at Brooklyn. It seems clear that when an industry says that lower duties will ruin it and close its factories, its statements are to be looked upon with suspicion.

He Will Not "Make Her Obey."

In a Sheffield church the other day a marriage ceremony came to an abrupt and altogether unlooked-for termination. It was the fault of the would-be bridegroom, and most people will say in losing his bride he met his deserts.

The ceremony went on right enough till the clergyman, addressing himself to the woman, put the question whether she would have the man to be her husband, "to love, honor and obey."

At the mention of the word "obey" the bridegroom ejaculated, "I'll make thee."

"Are we married yet?" asked the woman of the clergyman.

"No, you are not," he replied.

"Then we shall not be," said she, and thereupon she left the church.

The man protested that it was too late, but she heeded him not, and his discomfiture was made none the less when the parson told him that he thought she had acted very sensibly.—Irish Times.

FRANCE collects a duty of 22 cents a ton on coal and Germany admits coal free, yet the wages of coal miners in France is 75 cents a day, while in Germany the miners earn from 75 cents to $1.

Protection does not serve to work any better for labor in France than in our own country.

THE oleomargerine men, who have a protective duty of six cents per pound, are reported to have formed a trust, and already to have made two advances in price. A fine of $1,000 is said to be provided as a punishment for breaking the trust agreement.

COOK books are valuable in showing the cook what she had better avoid.

Love's Chilling Baptism.

Sam Haskell, a young man from Western avenue and Nineteenth street, whose ambition is to open a saloon, met his loved one Birdie Brown, of 443 South Clark street, and accused her of coquetry.

"Sam, do you doubt me," she cried.

"Avaunt, false one! You threw me over for Amos. We part forever,"

"I swear that I have never ceased to love you deeply, devotedly.

"Then prove it."

"Come then; if you love me as I do you we will walk arm in arm into Lake Michigan, and there end our troubled lives."

"I'll go you;" and the lovers linked their arms and started for the lake. When the couple arrived at the foot of Peck court they threw their arms about each other, lingered for five minutes, and then plunged into the lake.

Officer Gilman, of the Harrison Street station, saw the pair disappear, and, securing a long pole with an iron hook, stabbed Sam in the pantaloons and dragged him ashore. Then he fished Birdie out. Both were chilled. Sam. was taken to the Armory station, where he was hung over the steam pipes. Birdie excited the sympathy of a woman who was passing and who placed her in a cab and sent her home.—Chicago Tribune.

Fish Hatched in the Sky.

I observe a reference made in the American Angler touching upon showers of fish, in which it states that science has not yet fully explained the phenomenon. This is perhaps slightly incorrect. Several causes have been suggested. Might it not very probably be that fish and frogs which fall apparently from the skies are really bred there? Water fowl, it is known, very frequently carry eggs of fish to a great distance, having swallowed them, and in their flight disgorging the same unharmed, where they can and do fructify and mature in water over which these birds pass. The eggs of many old fish are very glutinous, and readily adhere to substances brought in contact with them during particular times of their incubation. It is not very probable that not only do these birds convey ova upon their wings as well as in their crops, and when flying at great heights the ova, becoming detached from the wings, may remain suspenedd in the moist atmosphere, which is quite possible under certain conditions of atmospherical pressure, and that which under development they may become too heavy and naturally fall to the earth?

A "Night of Terror.

The priest of the district of Bristen, in the Canton of Uri, writes to the Lucerne Vaterland an account of "a night of terror," which his people passed through a few nights ago. The whole valley was covered deeply with snow. Shortly after midnight those who were still awake felt a sort of shudder pass through the valley, followed by a succession of explosions with a noise like the loudest thunder. It was an avalanche of the finest snow, like powder, which swept down the valley from the Bristenstock with such force that its destructive force extended nearly half a mile below the termination of the glacier. Some houses were entirely wrecked, and the roofs were entirely blown away from others. In one of those unroofed houses two girls were sleeping in an upper room when the avalche fell upon them, completely burying them. In the morning they were dug out. Beyond their terrible fright they suffered no harm. Numbers of trees have been uprooted and even broke into pieces, and the whole neighborhood presents a picture of desolation. —London Times.

The Milkman's Confession.

A St. Louis lady tells the strange confession of a milkman. For some time past she had suspected that the cream left at her house was diluted. Although it had plenty of foam on top, it did not seem equal in quality to good milk. She determined to interrogate the milkman, and so she watched for him. When he came she informed him of her suspicions. At first he insisted that the cream was as good as any sold, but when she persisted in her statement that she had drunk country milk that was far better, he weakened and said:

"Can you keep a secret, mum? Well, to tell you the truth, mum, the cream you got is not cream at all. The foam that is on top is made from the white of eggs, and is put there to make you believe you are getting the genuine article. But you are right in suspecting you ain't, mum. It's nothing but a delusion—and maybe you might say a sham, too, But I don't know. Most people never find out the difference, and so long as they don't know as how they are being fooled, why, what's the odds?"

He Earned It.

The other hot day when a tramp asked a woman on Clifford street for something to eat, she replied:

"Earn it and I will."

"But what have you to do!"

"Nothing, really, but you get that snow shovel from the shed and go out and pretend that there's a foot of snow on the walk. Go through the motions anyhow."

The fellow saw the humor of the situation, and he plied the shovel so vigorously that at the end of twenty minutes he had a crowd of thirty people looking at him.

"Snow all cleaned off, ma'am'" he reported at the door.

"Very well, clean your feet and come into the kitchen—Free Press.

The Western Settlers' Specifi .

Carelessly picking up a newspaper the other day our eye was caught by the above title. It turned out to be a puff of the marvelous virtues of some patent medicine. But our thought ran on something like this: A "specific" is a sure cure. What are some of the ills of the Western settler, for which he needs a sure cure? Well: homesickness, discontent with his situation, dullness from running in one groove, seeing no new faces, getting behind the times, and being hidebound in his opinions. For all these, there is no "specific" so reliable as travel. Is the wife discouraged and home sick? Send her on a visit to the old home. Do you think the people back east are having better times than you? Go back and take a look around for a few weeks. Do you think your opinions are the only ones that are about right? Get out into the world, and see how many people there are who know more than you. In short, travel, get out of your shell, mingle with the world. In what direction you go, the best line for you to travel is "The Burlington." It reaches all points. Your local agent can supply you with a ticket. If he cannot, write for information to W. J. More Time.

Busy people always seem to have plenty of time. Their day is only twenty-four hours long, yet out of that twenty-four hours—fourteen hundred and forty moments—they find space for an astonishing amount of work. They are never afraid to undertake a new thing. They have always a few minutes to give to a friend. They will secure an hour for some congenial occupation. It is to the busy men you go, asking can they take a part in this new project. Certainly; state what you would like done, or how you wish it, and they will lend a hand. Why, if you so desire, they will take time to tell you just what you ought to begin and how to manage it. And when one piece of work is accomplished they pass to the next with perfect readiness and a calm confidence in their own ability.

Yes, strange to say, the people who never have time to do anything are those who never have anything to do. They would start this scheme, take part in that transaction, if they only had a little more time. They would be so glad to pay these calls, only too delighted to give that help, to learn a language, or to read a book, but they cannot make the time. And while they lament their lack of it, all the time they had is gone and their plans are still unfinished.

After all, what more time have the busy than the idle? Has not each of us today? Has not each of us all the time there is?

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15. 1891. Secretary Blaine's physical condition is a source of grave apprehension to his family and friends, and it is now an open secret to his political friends, that he would not dare to become the Standard bearer of the Republican party next year, because of failing health. He has been away from Washington more than a week, and has been sick in bed, in New York, with what is reported as an attack of acute indigestion. It is well-known, however, that this is not the first attack of a similar nature that he has suffered from recently. Less than two months ago he was prostrated suddenly by a similar attack, and for a few days his condition was regarded as serious; almost critical for hours. This happened one night after he had attended a dinner party. Secetary Noble, Ex-Senator Evarts and a few others were present. It was a stag party, and while formalities were laid aside, wit and humor and repartee prevailed. Secretary Blaine and Mr. Evarts were in their happiest mood, and kept their companions at the table fairly convulsed with laughter. The Secretary forgot the injunctions of his doctors and ate heartily of everything, only to be prostrated as if in a fit when he reached home about 1o'clock in the morning. Then for two weeks he had to keep indoors, most of the time in bed; and was given out that he was suffering with the gout; but it was nothing like gout, and his friends knew it, although the true facts were for a time concealed from the public. Dispatches from New York to day say Secretary Blaine will start for Washington tomorrow, but no one who knows of his really precarious condition expects that he will do so, or that he will do anything else for the present but nurse himself by abstaining from business and the excitment and strain of affairs of State as much as possible for weeks.

By the change in appointment of members of Congress for the next Congress the Electoral College in 1892 will be considerably enlarged, so that 223 votes will be required to elect a presidential candidate instead of 201 as in 1888. Politicians here in both parties are beginning to look over the field, and are speculating already about the probability of the election of President in 1892, being thrown into the house of Representatives. In the last two Presidential Campaigns, with 201 votes as a majority of the electoral, the Democrats had to look to New York with 36 votes; the solid south 153 votes, and either Indiana 15 or New Jersey 9 and Connecticut 6 votes for victory. Their necessities are greater under the new apportionment, since with 223 as a majority of the Electoral College, they will be obliged to get the South increased to 158, New York 36, Indiana 15, New Jersey increased to 10, Connecticut 6—in all 225, or two more than necessary. They cannot, as in 1884 and 1888, spare Indiana or the two states of New Jersey and Conmecuticut, but must carry them all or replace such as are lost by others of equal electoral value. These calculations based on existing facts and probabilities, are liable to be upset by two or three contingencies. Either if the Democrats carry all the Northern States named, they may lose West Virginia or Delaware, or the Republicans may lose some of the Western States or Rhode Island, or the Farmers' Alliance may carry certain states and the election be thrown into the House of Representatives. In the latter event the Democrats having a majority of seats in the next Congress would win. The change in the manner of casting the electoral vote in Michigan may also be an important foctor in the result. The 14 votes of Michigan will certainly not all be thrown as heretofore for the Republican candidates. Altogather, the outlook is interesting, and because of its perplexities and the uncertain figure the Farmers' Alliance movement may cut in the next presidential campaign, makes it certain that next year's presidential contest will be the most exciting, no matter who are the candidates, held for years, with a fair prospect that the House of Representatives will ultimately have to decide the matter.

The Census Bureau's recent report on the Public Debt of the United States and foreign countries shows that the world bears a heavy burden of debt, and that upon the whole the burden is increasing. The world's debt in 1890 according to these census figures, was $26, 917, 096,680 having increased about $4,000,000,000 since 1880. The debt of the United States in 1890 was in round numbers $916,000,000 against $1,922,000,000 in 1880, or a reduction of one thousand millions during the ten past years. The only other country in the world, that has approached our debt paying, is Great Britian, which has paid off in the decade, $320,000,000 of debt. In addiition to this billion dollars of principal paid off by the United States there was paid in the ten years the immense sum of $525,000,000 interest. Pensions are made to increase as fast as the interest charge diminishes; the debt to the soldier taking the place of the debt to the bond holder, and since 1880 we have paid $700, 000,000 in pensions.

The May crop report of Secretary Rusk of the Department of Agriculture, just issued, points to better prices for corn, weat, and live-stock. All indications, he says, point to positive improvements in rural prospects, and render practically certain a year of general agricultural prosperity. Western prices of corn are more than 100 per cent higher than in May a year ago; the same may be said of oats, and wheat has advanced about 30 per cent. The wheat crop of this year, he says, promises to be large. A few weeks will fix the relative rise of it. Ordinarily a large crop would depress prices. This year the prospective reduction of foreign crops, which is assured, will certainly make a demand for any crop we are likely to produce at remunerative, if not relatively high prices. The exhaustion of maize surplus will have its effect in sustaining corn prices during the year. The same is true of the oats crop.

The latest political news is the story that comes from New York to the effect that Cleveland will be the democratic nominee for governor this fall. According to the story the followers of the ex-president have been much annoyed at the reports that it would not do to nominate Cleveland in '82, because he could not carry his own state. Cleveland himself keenly feels these criticisms, and while he has said nothing on the subject, yet he has intimated to his friends that if he could consistent with his dignity, show the fallacy of the reports he would unhesitatingly do so. The matter was talked over by Cleveland's followers in New York and a decision reached whereby Grover could soon learn his status with the rank and file of the party in the state. His trip to Buffalo was the first move of the scheme. He will now visit other parts of the state, and deliver a series of campaign speeches such as the Buffalo effort. The ex-president is not seeking the gubernatorial nomination, but his friends have assured him that the state can only be saved to the party by his nomination. The Cleveland men are working hard to secure the nomination for him, for his election as governor would mean the presidential nomination in '92. It is a very shrewd political game and the New York republicans are watching it with interest.

A delegation of citizens with a numerously signed petition waited upon Sam Rosenthal yesterday afternoon and requested that he keep off the street with those new pants when a band is playing. The music of the pathfinder band was completely smothered when Sam appeared on the scene yesterday.

Reports that come from the Pacific Coast country are not very encouraging. Parties who have been out there say that business is almost at a stand still and in the larger cities there are thousands of idle men. In short the boom has flattened out as it must in all countries where there is nothing in it but wind. Many who have left the Red River Valley to pick up a fortune in the far west are now wishing they were back where there is prosperity all the time.

If one-half the reports in circulation in regard to the census office have the slightest foundation in fact, the office is a disgrace to the American people, while it will fix a stigma upon the administration and the president cannot escape personal responsibility.

That incompetency has largely predominated in the work of that office will no longer admit of dispute, but that its management should be such as to admit of the charge of being an unfit place for ladies to take positions in, is something too terrible to believe without the most convincing proof.—St. Paul News.

A farmer's wife remarked the other day: "We bought our farm (about two hundred acres) and paid for it when cheese was only a shilling a pound. Some years ago we sold $1,500 worth of stock and crops. But four o'clock in the morning usually found us up and at work. We went to bed early—seldom lighted a lamp in summer—and so had plenty of time to rest, if we were early risers Young people now must have nice carriages, parlor furniture, chamber suites and piano or organ and everything in as good style as possible when they begin to keep house. Instead of buying such things at the outset, better purchase a few acres of land and then get plain furnishing. One need not go without the comforts of life: but a great many things will be better enjoyed if waited for till the farm is paid for. Another thing, let us buy fewer acres and cultivate them better. We shall then have to pay out less for hired help, and there is seldom a community where there is not chance to work out by the day, more or less, if we do not have quite work enough at home. Also, pennies make dollars, therefore stop the many little leaks found in nearly every farmer's household. The thrifty New England housewife buys nearly all her tinware with the paper rags that many young farmers' wives never think of saving. Many other little things if looked after would save many dollars in the course of a year.—A farmer's wife in N. Y. Tribune.

Carelessly picking up a newspaper the other day our eye was caught by the above title. It turned out to be a puff of the marvelous virtues of some patent medicine. But our thought ran on something like this: A "specific" is a sure cure. What are some of the ills of the Western settler, for which he needs a sure cure? Well: homesickness, discontent with his situation, dullness from running in one groove, seeing no new faces, getting behind the times, and being hidebound in his opinions. For all these, there is no "specific" so reliable as travel. Is the wife discouraged and home sick? Send her on a visit to the old home. Do you think the people back east are having better times than you? Go back and take a look around for a few weeks. Do you think your opinions are the only ones that are about right? Get out into the world, and see how many people there are who know more than you. In short, travel, get out of your shell, mingle with the world. In what direction you go, the best line for you to travel is "The Burlington." It reaches all points. Your local agent can supply you with a ticket. If he cannot, write for information to W. J. A Little Girl's Experience In a Lighthouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Loren Trescott are keepers of the Gov. Lighthouse at Sand Beach, Mich. and are blessed with a daughter, four years old. Last April she was taken down with the Measles, followed with a dreadful Cough and turned into a fever. Doctors at home and at Detroit tried her, but in vain, she grew worse rapidly, until she was a mere "handful of bones".—Then she tried Dr. Kings New Discovery and after the use of two and a half bottles, was completely cured. They say Dr. King's New Discovery is worth its weight in gold, yet you may get a trial bottle free at W. A. Shreiter's Drugstore.

When a newspaper is not liberally supported by a community, it is a clear proof that either the community is poverty stricken or that that citizens are narrow minded maniacs that stand in the way of their own welfare.

A TALE OF WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

Several years ago a youth might have been seen seated among a number of young lads who were being examined previous to their entering the Freshmen Class of one of the New England colleges. There were those more handsome among the crowd than George Liveston; but there were few whose bright eyes and intelligent countenances bespoke more of true genius than his. After the severe ordeal of an examination had been passed, there were none that had acquitted themselves with so much honor as he.

Many were the college tricks and riots; but never was he to be found among the number of those engaged in them. His was a nobler aim for a more enduring happiness.

The city of Providence is noted for the kindness and beauty of the fair sex; and what student of Brown's University has not felt their influence? And in the lone hour of night, burning the midnight oil, toiling away at his lessons, the image of some loved one has come to his mind, and with new zeal has he labored on at the difficult task which he was tempted to throw aside, declaring that for her he would win high honors, and inscribe his name upon the topmost niche of the Temple of Fame.

George Liveston, like the rest of his fellow-students, had become fascinated by Clara Beardsley, with all the enthusiasm and devotion of a youth who never before had felt Cupid's influence. We will not attempt to describe her; sufficient be it to say that she was handsome, and of that age, "sweet sixteen," which is the most captivating to the youthful lover.

Often did he picture in his mind Clara and himself dwelling together in happiness and prosperity, when he should stand first and foremost in his profession—that of medicine. Little dreaming that the golden cord of friendship, love and fidelity could be severed; little knowing that he was worshipping a heartless coquette, whose words of love and fidelity to him might seem fair, but which were breathed with equal passion and devotion to many others.

Many were the times he had been entreated by his fellow-studenes to engage with them in some college debauchery; but as often had her image come to his mind, and he had resovled to do no deed which should cause her to blush for him. With these resolutions, and standing first in his class, he entered upon his first junior year.

At the same time there was an addition made to the college in the shape of a youth, who had been dismissed by the Faculty of a neighboring college, and now sought to enroll his name at Brown's. He little cared for the Faculty, college-laws, or books: his delight seemed to be in being the ringleader in every college scrap; while at the same time he loved a harmless flirtation, and boasted that he had never seen a young lady that could fascinate him.

Strange as it may seem, George Liveston and he became bosom friends, although they seemed exactly the opposite by nature; the one quiet and sedate, the other lively, even to rudeness; one a studious youth the other totally indifferent to study; one shunned the wine-cup as though it were a viper, the other delighted to quaff the poisonous liquor. Seldom does it fall to human lot to behold two beings so different by nature so firm in each other's friendship and esteem as were George Liveston and Harry Percival.

One evening, in company with a fellow-student, as Harry Percival was promenading the street, he met George Liveston with some ladies, Clara Beardsley among the number.

"Why, who is that new student, George?" exclaimed Clara.

"Harry Percival—one of the best fellows at college. He has the reputation of being one of the greatest flirts, and he is——"

"Please stop your description of all his wonderful qualities—go and bring him here. Seeing is believing. I am dying for an introduction to him."

With this request from Clara, George hastened to overtake his friend actuated by two motives; one, to please Clara, for every word of hers was to him law; and, on the other hand, he was anxious to show to his friend the being he had often described to him as the one that, in his own estimation, it was but necessary "to see to love, and, loving, to adore."

"Harry, those young ladies I have just left are exceedingly anxious to form your acquaintance."

"Not this evening, George; there are too many ladies there for one so young and diffident as myself, but, if you desire it, I will accompany you to see your friend to-morrow evening, providing she will be alone."

Bearing this message, George returned to his friends. Disappointed as they were, they were not discouraged.

"I'll tell you, girls, what we will do," said Clara. "To-morrow evening he intends to call and see me; you all come, too, and we will take him by surprise."

"Yes, and you will capture him," said Fanny Johnson.

"If I don't it won't be my fault, just for his impudence, this evening."

"Do not be too sure! Remember, a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," whispered Fanny, with a sly glance at George.

The next evening George and Harry called according to their previous arrangement, and were enjoying themselves, when the door-bell rang and Fanny Johnson entered; another ring, and another young lady entered; and soon Harry found himself surrounded on all sides, but tempted to yield only to one; to Clara, was he willing to surrender himself for life. Yes—he had found in her one who could fascinate him; and he bowed, a willing victim, at her shrine.

Did she love him? From that evening did George Liveston cease to occupy her thoughts; from that evening did Harry Percival, who had never loved before, love fervently and passionately; from that evening did George and Harry cease to be intimate friends, and very soon they became bitter enemies.

And from that evening seemed to date the ruin and downfall of one who had always stood first in his class; one, who before had never sought the intoxicating glass became reckless of himself, and endeavored to seek relief from sorrow in the flowing bowl, amid the revelry of his fellow-students. Each night he sought his room inebriated.

But Harry Percival forsook his old haunts of vice for Clara's society, caring as little for his lessons as ever. Each morning he sought to meet her in the street, that, if possible, he might receive one smile, one token of recognition, one look of love to cheer his heart. Each evening he was to be found by her side; by him the wine cup was forsaken, the college debauchery neglected.

But George Liveston took his place. Both alike proved reckless of study, for George cared little for the future, while Harry dreamed not of manfully fighting the battle of life, but only of basking in the sunshine of Clara's presence.

Harry Percival and Clara Beardsley were engaged. Never did youth love so desperately as he, and never was youth more decieved. Clara loved to flirt; and that same heart that could profess eternal devotion to George Liveston, then cast him aside without one sigh of regret, as she beheld him on the downward road to ruin, could in likemanner deceive Harry Percival, and only waited for sufficient opportunity so to do, hoping that, like George Liveston, he would down his love in the wine-cup, and she be free to seek another victim.

It was Commencement Day. George Liveston came forward upon the stage. His cheeks were flushed his very manner showed that even now, at the close of his college course, had he been indulging too freely in the intoxicating beverage. His theme was "Our Mision,"—the mission of himself and classmates. Alas! What hope, what prospect had he?

The next orator was Harry Percival. He spoke eloquently; all eyes were turned upon him. His theme was "A Young Man's Hope," How he dwelt upon the bright future, the flattering prospect before him and fellow students! The exercises over, the palm of success was allotted to him.

Student after student was now bidding farewell to those with whom for years he had spent many hours in pleasant intercourses, wandering together "by the green pasture and still waters of knowledge." George and Harry had parted, perhaps never again to meet on earth Clara and Harry had said farewell, made pledges of eternal devotion to remain true to each other. All seemed bright to him. Often would he visit her, and in a few short years, when he had obtained his profession, would he claim her as his bride.

A few weeks only had passed when she wrote to him desiring to be released from the engagment, she had never regarded it as serious. Harry hastened to her side; more earnestly than ever pleaded his love; spoke of their vows which were registered in heaven, those pledges which he believed were binding, and which were acknowledged to be a fact; he entreated and urged her to pause. No, she never did, nor never could love him. They parted. He often afterwards sought her society, but was as often refused.

Many were now her admirers, true and noble youths, who could not resist her charms, believing her noble and true, base and false as she was. Harry again sought her, only as a friend, advising her to cease her deceit, or the time would come when her nearest friends would forsake her. She heeded him not, and in disdain cast away his advise.

Little did she know whom she had rejected, and how soon she would be called upon to entreat of him as he had of her.

On that very day when their engagement was broken did he vow from that hour (not, like George Liveston, to drown his sorrow in the wine-cup) but that he would with new zeal, new energy, devote himself to his profession, and strive to inscribe his name high in the Temple of Fame. And nobly was he rewarded for his years of toil.

And where, all this time, was George Liveston? Had he sunk deeper and deeper in vice, or had he found one in whom to care? Had he again been a worshipper at woman's shrine? Yes; he had found one of the purest of earth's beings, one who would remain to him as true as the needle to the pole. But, alas! again was he doomed to disappointment. Death came and robbed him of his treasure; and, as he beheld that form, once so beautiful now cold and lifeless, he thought of the past, of his first love, and of her who now slumbered in the new-made grave; and he vowed to live a new life; he saw there was nothing permanent this side of heaven; he would seek to gain an entrance to that heavenly mansion where sin and sorrow are unknown; he would become a minister of the gospel.

There came to Clara Beardsley a stranger from the far West. He knelt a worshipper at her shrine, spoke of his dwelling within view of a northern lake, where they might for ever enjoy each other's society, and revel together in love. She yielded, against the advice of her friends. In the dead hour of night she secretly left her chamber, bidding farewell to that roof which so long had sheltered her, dear to her by so many hallowed reminiscences, a loving father, a kind mother, and a beloved sister, all who so long had cared for her, to go with one whom she knew not. They hastened to the station and sped on their way towards Chicago. Here he sought a clergyman, before taking her to her future home.

They entered his dwelling and the man of God appeared. What was it that caused that sudden start? Why was that cheek which had looked so healthful, so pale? Before her she saw her youthful lover, George Liveston.

The words were pronounced which fettered them for life. They left the dwelling, she not daring to ask why that change from a youthful drunkard to a minister of the Church. To a hotel they hastened, for not yet was he prepared to take her to that home which he had before pictured as being so full of hope and promise.

Weeks passed; she grew weary; longed for her father's mansion, the dear ones at home. He who had sworn to remain forever true now returned late at night with no words of cheer from lips that savored of wine.

Time passed. There in her chamber, lonely and sad, the wife waited anxiously, waited long; but those welcome footsteps cheered her not. She fell asleep, and awoke only as the morning sun stole in through the window. Why had he not come? She learned too soon that her husband was a gamester, and was confined in gaol for forgery. Yes, for forgery!

How could she release him—innocent as she believed him to be? She inquired for the most celebrated lawyer in the place, and was directed to a large, handsome house; thither she hastened, not knowing hardly what she was doing, and soon entered his private office, told her story and entreated his assistance.

She looked up, daring to hope for aid. Before her stood Harry Percival the ardent lover of her youth. To him she had been kneeling, supplicating, and entreating. What if he, as she once did, should disdain her suit—treat her with scorn and contempt? No, he accepted.

Upon the day of the trial he entered the court-room. Behold his client! By his side sat his sorrowful bride. Dark the case seemed, stern and severe the judge, still more stern and hard-hearted appeared the jury. At length he pleaded, with all the eloquence of former years. It was but words idly spoken then; what if such should now prove the case?

She knelt before that vast assembly to thank her kind benefactor. She rose; by his side stood his friend and class-mate, the Rev. George Liveston, who, fearing the worst, had determined to be present to console her.

The evening she had last stood before him, had he desired to speak words of caution; but well he knew, from past experience, reproach and scorn would be returned for the kindness. All he had to do—all he could do—was to unite the bonds and ask Heaven to bless their union; that her pathway through life might be strown with flowers, and never be called upon to partake of Marah's bitter waters.

The trial over, the scene forgotten, that wife earnestly hoped it would be a change for the better. Vain hope! delusive fancy! as well might you try to stop the onward flow of the Mississippi by wooing it with pleasant words, as to seek by human influence to change the career of one so steeped in crime.

But there came some comfort at last; a babe was born—the image of its father. How she watched, wept, and prayed that it would cheer her pathway, and on the great ocean of life avoid the shoals and quicksands upon which his father had been hopelessly wrecked.

Lonely and sad, one Sunday morning, sorrowful at heart as she heard the merry chimes of the Sabbath bells, memory led her back to the sacred past, and she determined to seek the house of God, with her little one by her side she entered one of the large churches of the city. With her head bowed in grief she scarce dared look around, until at last the minister arose and announced his text. Such eloquence before she had never heard, and with breathless silence that vast assembly drank in his words.

And who was it that admiring crowds thus loved to listen to?

After services she hastened away to her hotel, for as yet she had not found that home which her ardent lover had pictured to her as being so full of beauty and promise, and for which she had exchanged her father's mansion.

Years had passed since then; her aged father and loved mother had departed to a better land, where the "weary are at rest."

While she was thinking of her youthful days, a servant entered the room, bearing a note.

She hastily opened and read; the worst had come at last. In a moment of passion her husband had struck a fellow-gambler, injuring him to such an extent that his life was despaired of, and he was again confined in jail.

She hastened to him with words of comfort and devotion, then again sought the mansion of Harry Percival, to plead and entreat again for his services.

Alas! will he again, without fee or reward, engage in so dark a cause?

She rang the door-bell; a servant appeared. With trembling lips she inquired for Harry Percival. No such person lived there.

"Where does he live?"

The maid did not know, and the people had gone away for the summer season, to what place she did not remember.

She sought her hotel, disheartened and disappointed; and when the day of trial arrived another lawyer was entrusted with the fate of her husband!

It is not necessary for us here to describe the trial, or the feelings of that wife, as the jury returned the verdict—"Guilty!"

There remained but one chance of relief—one hope of success—that of pardon.

Clothed in the habiliments of mourning, the wife sought the Governor of the State, to ask of him that mercy which is twice blessed. The governor appeared before her in the person of Harry Percival. With her face veiled she told him her mission: he refused. She cast aside her veil, displaying to his gaze the countenance of one whose smile, long years before, could influence; but now it had lost its magic power; he could not yield.

She turned away—she who once could bring all men suppliants to her shrine, then reject them with scorn, was, at last herself rejected!

There was yet another chance for success. She sought his wife, enlisted her sympathy in her behalf, and successfully, for she added her prayer to that of the wife, and the pardon was granted.

With all speed she hastened to bear the glad tidings to him who now, she felt confident, would not again err.

No, loving wife, never again will he err!

On arriving at the cell door, what a scene! There stood the minister of the Gospel, George Liveston bending over a dying man—her husband.

With his own hands he had destroyed his life.

Who can describe the sorrow of that wife as they bore her away from the scene? And we, kind reader, for the present will draw the curtain.

* * * * * * *

Years have passed. The Rev. George Liveston, who, all this time has been known as the bachelor divine, is to be married. His bride is Clara, whom he loved so enthusiastically in his youth.

Harry Percival and his wife are there to bless the union, and amid so much happiness, reached at last, we will draw our story to a close, and say, "Heaven bless them!"

HE WAS FASTIDIOUS.

A Burglar in Philadelphia Who Had Delicate Nerves.

A burglar broke into a house up in North Philadelphia last week and found his way into the parlor, where he struck a light and looked about him. Then he gave one long shriek and fell senseless to the floor. The family came down and found him there and revived him.

"Take me to jail! take me out! get me away from here! I am punished. God knows I have suffered. I have stood up against army rifles and toy pistols, bulldogs, brass knuckles and electric mats; I have conquered spike fences and patent bolts, but, madame," to the serious, fat-looking woman, who stood by in a nightrobe, with a withered look on her face, grasping the neck of a cod liver oil bottle, "I'm a sensitive man, of tender sympathies, and would sooner go to jail than abuse my harmonious spirit with a further inspection of this abominable apartment. Put handcuffs on me and take me out, or I will die at the sight of those macrame lambrequins and green tidies."—The Upholsterer.

Will vs Circumstances.

A writer in the New England Farmer makes the following interesting comments concerning the power of will over circumstances.

Last summer I chanced to find an old schoolbook which probably had never been opened since its owner, a girl student, died forty years ago. The book was filled with loose sheets of paper, covered with hand-writing, uniform and beautiful. There were drawings of plants and their separate leaves and flowers; there were carefully written notes of lectures; copies of poems which were fresh then, but have now become standard selections. Some difficult mathematical problems were also worked out, and the whole was the work of an earnest student.

My conclusion was, as I reverently laid aside the book, that will is stronger than circumstances.

The high-school girl of to-day, bright as she is, cannot show better work than this New England farmer's daughter, of what our girls would term "long ago."

Hope for Him.

How often do we hear a parent say of a mischievous boy: "I would not mind so much if I could only believe him." Whatever his other traits, truth is essentially the touchstone of a boy's character. The following case in point appears in the Christian Leader:

"I don't know that you will be able to do much with him," said a father to the principal of a school, to whom he had brought his son as a pupil, "he is so full of mischief."

"Does he tell the truth?" asked the principal. "Can I always depend upon his word?"

"Oh, yes," said the father, "he is honest, he will tell the truth, even when it is against himself; you may depend upon that."

"Then we can manage him," said the principal. "He will make a reliable, manly man."

The Chinese Alligator.

Two examples of the Chinese alligator have just reached the London Zoological Gardens. They are the first that have been ever exhibited there alive. The alligator is so distinctively an American animal that the proof, so recently as 1879, of the species in China was extremely interesting. Nevertheless, the Chinese classics contain numerous references to the creature, and even pictures, which could be easily recognized as being meant for a crocodile of some sort. It is to be hoped that the specimens at the Zoo will bear out the notion of the extreme longevity of the reptile. Its name is apparently used in certain parts of China in the same sense as Methusaleh in this country. Marco Polo wrote about this animal, and recommended its gall as an excellent remedy for the bite of a mad dog and various other compliints, so that it seems to have been the medieval equivalent of some of our much advertised remedies of the present day. Curiously enough, the beast is even now made use of in Chinese medicine.

The Circus Lion.

A circus man says: "Some people think that the lion is the king of beasts, but if they could only see what I have seen they would change their opinion. A few years ago we were showing in the Midlands, when one of the lions got out of his cage and was about to make his escape, when a man of powerful build, who happened to be standing near, stepped up to his lordship and deliberately kicked him until he turned and crept back into the cage.

"At another time a drunken keeper opened a cage door and a large lion was about to spring out, when my brother seized a barrel stave and hammered the beast on the head. It crouched down upon the floor, and then one of the men went up and shut the cage. When he first saw the lion about to escape it was standing with its head and shoulders outside the bars and one bound would have given it freedom."

Nobody has ever claimed that a circus or menagerie lion is the "king of beasts." But when you meet a lion on his native and original jurisdiction, we doubt that it would be a healthy operation to try to thrash him with a barrel stave.

And if any man tried to kick a lion wandering upon his customary territory we are inclined to think that the result would be disastrously fatal to him.

Badly Rusted Coronets.

Disgraced and blackguard peers are now quite a strong body in England. One of the Irish earls, who was a corporal in the Life Guards before he succeeded to his title, did six months' hard labor for some breach of military discipline. Another peer an English one and the son of a Lord High Chancellor, can never show his face in the House of Lords again. He committed a disgusting crime. He has dropped his title and is now clerk to a firm of auctioneers in Australia. The Marquis of Aylesbury still affects his costermonger suit on odd occasions, and likes to make a bet that he will sell a barrow of greens as quickly as any hawker in Whitechapel. By the way, it is interesting to note in the peerage for 1891 that the marchioness once known as Dolly Tester now figures as "Dorothy Julia, daughter of T. Hasely, esq." Tester's papa was about as unmitigated a ruffian of the tough tribe as England has ever produced.—Chicago Herald.

Something About Dollars.

The dollar sign ($) is not a monogram of "U. S." but dates from the days when the transfer was made from Spanish to American dollars and accounts were kept equally in dollars and reals, Thus: One dollar eight reals. Later the 8 was placed between the perpendicular parallel lines [8]; then the perpendicular lines crossed the eight and combined with it to form the present sign ($).

But the origin of the dollar mark is not so important a question as how to get the dollars, and how to get the most out of them afterwards. A great many rules for becoming wealthy have been given, and John Jacob Astor's—"Cut down your expenses and let your income run on"—is as good as any. We can, however, offer some advice on spending the money especially if you intend to use any of it traveling. Select "The Burlington" when you want to reach any prominent place in the East, West, North or South, and its luxurious equipment, fast time, and sure connections will convince you that it gives you the most for your money. Any ticket agent can sell you tickets by this line, or you can address W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent C. B. & N. R. R., St. Paul.

A.'s mother was putting him to bed one night. Perhaps he was unusually tired, certain it is he was very unwilling to go through with his evening devotions, and when his mother gently but firmly insisted, he said: "Oh, dear, you'll make me wear my teeth all out saying my prayers!"

"My wife cured me of a very severe colic in five minutes with Johnson's Anodyne Liniment."

Intellect is a mercenary who will fight under any banner, and never once stumbles over moral scruples.

How Shells are Classified.

Shells, as we popularly call them, are grouped by naturalists under the head of mollusks, and in the scale of life they represent the sixth great branch of the animal kingdom, following the worms, though some naturalists classify them differently. The branch is divided into classes. First we have the shells with two valves, as the oyster, which is a Lamellibranch, a long word referring to the folds in the animal.

Some of these have siphons and some have not. Then we come to the single shelled mollusks, or gasteropods, so called because they are belly footed. Then there are the shell-less forms, the air breathing mollusks, as snails, and finally the squids, or cephalopods, or head footed, all of which have their peculiarities, and are well worth special study if the reader is interested in shells. The oysters are the lowest forms of the group, the humblest, yet the most valuable. "A blue point" in a deep shell represents a vast industry and a delicious morsel.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

It Took a Long Time to Decide.

The wife of a celebrated divine has such a fancy for Angora cats that she has a room devoted to them, leading out of which a gallery is built, so that the animals can have exercise and fresh air without wandering away.

In addition to the cat craze, a monkey was added to the household menagerie, and all went pleasantly until one day, as the doctor stepped into his bath, the monkey jumped in with him. Then there was wrath in the man's eye, when, after a brief struggle, he left the bath tub, holding the monkey by the neck, both dripping with water, and marched into the presence of his good lady, saying:—

"Madam, this monkey business has gone too far; you must decide between me and the monkey!"

She looked placidly up from a cat she was petting, saying:—

"Will you give me twenty-four hours to decide, dear?"

The monkey is still a member of the household.

It's the only way to use some things, but it's a bad condition for a man or woman. It means disease. Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. That means health. It invigorates the liver and kidneys, purifies the blood and cleanses and renews the whole system. For all scrofulous humors and blood-taints, and even consumption (or lung-scrofula), if taken in time, it's a positive remedy. It's a guaranteed one. In all diseases of the liver, blood and lungs, it's warranted to benefit or cure, or the money is refunded. No other medicine of its class is sold, through druggists, on this peculiar plan. FARM AND HOUSEHOLD.

VARIOUS RURAL TOPICS AND DOMESTIC HINTS.

The Principle of Supply and Demand Sure to Solve the Problem of Raising Hogs for Profit—When the Cow Becomes Ill.

Farmers and Their Hogs.

Owing to alternate surplusages and shortages, live stock, like grain and all products, whether of the farm or of the factory, are subject to the dominating influence of supply and demand which forces fluctuations in prices. For a series of months, often of years, because of over production, every species of animal food will command only prices for which it cannot be profitably produced, and these prices hold until not only the extra production ceases, but only the surplus is exhausted and there comes a demand which cannot be fully supplied. when prices begin and continue to advance, stimulating production until another surplus is found to exist. Thus, for several years hogs, cattle and sheep have been produced so largely in excess of market demands as to render the breeding and raising of these animals, except under the most favorable conditions, unprofitable. But the world's markets are short now, the consumption has overtaken the volume of production and the prices of hogs and cattle and sheep must tend upwards until a surplus again finds no adequate consumption. In the meantime more money will be made in raising these animals than was lost during the era of depression.—Colman's Rural World.

When Cows Are Ill.

Unfortunately, it is seldom noticed that a cow is ill until she actually refuses to eat, by which time she is in great danger, and drastic measures must be at once taken for her relief, which sometimes do not succeed in saving her life. When dry chaff is largely used during the winter season, the owner or his representative should be continually on the alert for this form of disease, easily recognizable in its first stages by the hardness of the droppings and the small quantity. The instant this is observed, a drench consisting of ¾ lb. of salts, ½ oz. carbonate of ammonia, and ½ oz. of ginger should be given, repeating the dose in a few hours, when relief of the bowels will be the result, and the danger over. When a case of milk fever occurs, constipation is always present, and unless this can be quickly relieved death will speedily ensue. Milk fever is, however, such a deadly disease, and runs its fatal course so quickly, that a cure is almost hopeless; Prevention is therefore the only course open to the stock-owner, who should use every precaution to avoid this dreadful scourge.—Rural World.

Butter vs. Beef.

Many men raise a pound of butter worth twenty-five cents, at the same cost and on the same quantity of land, that other men raise a pound of beef worth two to five cents. Two hundred pounds of butter a year from a cow, at 25 cents, means $50, whilst the same number of pounds of beef, at 5 cents means only $10. But a good cow will produce 300 lbs. of butter a year, and it takes a good steer to make 200 lbs. of beef. A well cared for orchard will, after it comes into bearing, bring from fifty to one hundred dollars an acre. A well cared for truck patch of ten acres will, if near communications with a large city, produce vastly more money than one hundred acres. managed under the seed farm plan. Then in the matter of poultry raisings There is no manner of doubt of its being a profitable business, or of the fact that for the money invested, if intelligently handled, there is a better show of profit than in others to which even more attention is paid.

Securing Workers for the Harvest.

Each bee-keeper ought thoroughly to understand the honey resources of his own locality. He should know when to expect a honey flow. When the time comes, the expected harvest may not come, but the bee-keeper should be in readiness for it. It is possible to have a good honey flow and yet secure no surplus, because there are not sufficient number of bees to gather it. Bees are valuable when there is honey to gather; at other times they are consumers. Less populous colonies can be more successfully wintered in the cellar than out-of-doors; while by proper protection and care in the spring, such colonies can be brought up to the requisite strength in time for the honey harvest. If by such management we are enabled to so reduce our colonies in strength during the non-producing time of the year that stores are saved to the amount of from three to five pounds per colony, we are well paid for our trouble.

Farmers Should Study.

It is a fact that cannot be disputed that farmers do not exercise their wits sufficiently in considering how they may widen the range of their business. If they confine themselves to raising corn and wheat, and pork and beef, their market will always be a narrow one. If they would exercise their ingenuity in the same way that manufacturers and other business men are constantly doing, in an effort to get up a greater diversity of products, or to put old products up in new ways, they could widen their market almost indefinitely.—Cincinnati Times.

Trees on the Farm.

It is much to be regretted that farmers do not take more interest in tree-planting. Any person who has travelled extensively over the prairies cannot have failed to notice the extreme baldness of most of the farms. I have seen hundreds which were not adorned with a tree of any kind though the land had been occupied for years, and I know of many more which boast of nothing but a small orchard, generally at some distance from the house, while the house itself is left at the mercy of sun and wind, unsheltered and unadorned by any tree. The fact is that every farm house should be in the midst of a grove of trees, and no house ever looked like a home without some such lovely growth about it.

Poultry for Profit.

A writer for the Orange Judd Farmer says: "I have bred a large number of breeds and varieties of poultry, and I find that hens with short legs, chunky bodies, short necks and small heads are, as a rule, indifferent layers. Hens the reverse of this description are the good layers, and we certainly can improve the laying qualities of a flock by a continued selection of this type. It is in this way that certain strains of nearly all the standard bred fowls, noted for their egg production, are produced. I would not, as a rule, pick out the bird scoring the highest by the standard for the best layer, simply because such birds are too frequently bred for 'fancy points,' and utility is lost sight of. I believe that latterly, however, nearly all breeders have been selecting types of birds for breeders that combine, as far as possible, utility and standard points. For my part I think we should first look after the useful and then the ornamental.

The Poultry Yard.

If from any cause any of the chickens get stunted the quicker they are marketed the better.

Wire cloth is a good material for doors and windows during the summer, when plenty of ventilation is needed.

Even with young chickens there are few materials that are better than good cornmeal for fattening; even a few days' feeding of it will be of benefit.

Hens that are two years old and are not good layers had better be fattened and marketed as soon as possible; they are an expense and return no income.

A row or two of sunflowers planted along with the corn will be found profitable to use in making a good variety of feed, especially during the winter.

Save the egg shells, put them into the oven and burn them brown; then mash them up fine and mix with the feed. It is healthy and beneficial to the fowls.

Broken grain, like cracked wheat or corn, millet seed or something of this kind, is better and healthier for young chickens than cornmeal or wheat middlings.

Live-Stock and Farm Notes.

Never feed a horse when hot.

It often pays to grind feed for an old horse.

In feeding calves only give what they will eat up clean.

Bad management often causes considerable loss with pigs.

A colt is the only young domestic animal that shows fear at birth.

Left out at night, sheep will nearly always seek the highest place to sleep.

So far as it is possible to avoid, the horse should not be groomed while eating.

Plaster and lime are good substances to mix thoroughly with hen manure in composting it.

Clean, thorough cultivation is as important with fruits as with any other crop grown on the farm.

Under ordinary conditions too much milk cannot be given to the poultry. Give them all they will eat or drink.

Generally it is poor economy to work a horse hard all day, and then turn him out to pick around all night.

While matched teams are desirable, so far as appearances are concerned, yet it is of more importance to have them matched in gait and strength.

The smoothness of the meadows will affect to a more or less extent the crop. In many cases it will pay to roll well after the frost is all out of the ground to level and pack down the soil.

Household Hints.

To drive nails or screws into hard wood dip the points into oil or grease.

It is well to varnish an oil cloth twice a year, and if you do, a good one will last you as long as you want it to.

Spots of grease may be effectually removed from the most delicate fabric by the application of dry buckwheat flour.

Indian meal mixed with lemon juice or good cider vinegar is said to be very soothing to hands roughened by cold or labor.

Ammonia is a most useful household article. For washing windows, brushes, and for performing many other services, it becomes almost indispensable to the careful housekeeper.

The Russian method of restoring the luster to fur sacques or fur garments of any kind is to heat rye flour as hot as you can bear your hand in it, rub it into the fur and let stand for a little while; then shake or brush it out thoroughly.

A very good imitation of ground glass is produced by dissolving three tablespoonfuls of Epsom salts in a pint of warm water and applying it to the glass with a common paint brush. This answers admirably when a sort of screen is wanted. The solution must be applied to the side of the glass which is not exposed to the weather.

The best way in which to clean hair brushes, says the Popular Science News, is with spirits of ammonia, as its effect is immediate. No rubbing is required and cold water can be used just as successfully as warm. Take a teaspoonful of ammonia in a quart of water; dip the hair part of the brush without wetting the ivory, and in a moment the grease is removed; then rinse in cold water; shake well and dry in the air, but not in the sun. Soda and soap soften the bristles and invariably turn ivory yellow.

THE CZAR'S FUNNY ESCAPE'

His Masquerade Dress Saves Him From a Robber.

Nicholas I. was very fond of masquerade balls, and onenight appeared at one in the character of the devil, with a grinning face, horns and tail, and appeared to enjoy the character very much.

About 3 o'clock in the morning he went out, and throwing over him some furs, called a coachman and ordered him to take him to the Quai Anglais. As it was very cold, he fell asleep, and when he awoke he found the man had taken him in the wrong direction, for the Quai Anglais is one of the most elegant portions of St. Petersburg, while before him were only some miserable houses.

Nicholas began to remonstrate, but the coachman paid no heed to him, and presently passing through a stone gateway, brought him into a cemetery, and, taking a large knife from his girdle, said:

"Give me your money and your furs or I will kill you."

"And do you give me your soul!" exclaimed Nicholas, as he threw off the furs and disclosed his personification of the devil.

The Russians are very superstitious, and the coachman was so terrified he fell senseless on the ground, and the Emperor drove himself back to his palace.—New York Home Journal.

UMBRELLA DISCIPLINE.

Quick Manner in Which the Teuton Regulates the Carrying Process.

A man just back from a Winter in Germany says:

"The only way of stopping the dangerous practice of carrying canes and umbrellas horizontally has long been known to the people of Berlin. There a man no sooner takes his walking stick under his arm than he feels a quick blow on it from behind. It either drops to the pavement or assumes the only proper and safe position in which a stick can be carried.

"There is no use in his getting angry with the person who struck the blow, or in his trying to do him up, for public opinion is the regulator of the barbarous and indefensible practice of which I speak.

"I have seen dozens of Americans treated to this discipline in Unter den Linden, while they were endangering the eyes and discommoding the bodies of the crowds there. Most of them whirled about with fight bristling all over them, but at a glance or two at the angry faces around them usually sufficed to calm them down."—Boston Herald.

Discipline in Russia.

It is a curious fact in connection with the Russian army that while it has often met defeat, it has never been routed; though beaten and driven from the field, it has never become a panic-stricken mob. This coherence in defeat is attributable to its splendid discipline and rigid obedience to orders, which are paramount to all other considerations.

A Russian force was moving to the attack of a position that was impregnable. A superior officer asked the commander where he was going.

"To attack the position in front," he replied.

"But it is folly—madness."

"I know it, but I have my orders."

"Oh, you have orders; move on then," the officer coolly said.

This incident takes a good deal of what has always been regarded as exaggeration out of the story that is told of a Russian army surgeon on his professional round. On entering the ward the officer in charge gives the command "Attention!" when each inmate at once takes the position of a soldier. "Tongues out!" is the next order, followed by the instant projection of that member. The surgeon, accompanied by an attendant, then proceeds along the line, examining each tongue and giving directions as to treatment. When the inspection is over the medical officer takes his departure, the command "Tongues in!" releases the line from its unpleasant and ludicrous position, and "In place rest" allows the men to resume their cots.

Mr. Smith's Leave-Taking.

Probably the final story of absent-mindedness will never be told. A correspondence of The Spectator vouches for the truth of an anecdote which he relates, apropos of recent discussions about plagiarism. He is, he says acquainted with the clergyman referred to, whose name he alters for publication.

The Rev. Septimus Smith was many years ago Vicar of St. Cross Neneham. He made no secret at all of his habit of buying ready-made sermons. He was a kindly-natured, easy-going man, and was popular among his people.

One Sunday morning, on going into the vestry after service found his old clerk in tears.

"What's the matter, Jones?" inquired the Vicar.

"O sir," replied the clerk, "this is a painful surprise to us all."

"Surprise Jones what do you mean, man?"

"Your sermon this morning, sir. We were all very sorry, and you gave us no warning."

"Sermon, Jones, sermon? What do you mean?"

"Why, your farewell sermon. We are all dreadfully cut up."

The Rev. Septimus had actually read to his congregation an old farewell sermon without either intending it, or knowing what he was saying to them.

The Soap that Cleans Most is Lenox.

To Contributors.

Taverner, of the Boston Post, makes a suggestion which may be commended, with some grains of allowance, to all contributors to The Companion. "I doubt," he says, "if Shakespeare himself would have furnished good 'copy' if he had attempted to put down his plays with a pencil and a pad," and he continues:

The late Philip Welch, who flooded all the comic papers and some of the serious ones with the most original, the most concise and pointed paragraphs, wrote each one—they were always short—in the middle of a sheet of good, thick notepaper.

Thus he secured two advantages. Having a sheet of paper for each joke, he was under no temptation to lengthen his witticism to suit the page; and the nature of his material, such as one would use for an invitation to an evening party, naturally led him to be concise and finished—to have a beautiful bon mot in the exact middle of a beautiful expanse of white.

I will only add that I make these observations chiefly for the benefit of my friend, Penloper, whose comparative failure as a humorist I attribute to his use of cheap yellow paper and an ill-sharpened pencil.

Proved in Court.

It is a little strange, perhaps,—and yet not so very strange when one comes to think of it,—that the truth of a thing is not always the better established because it has stood the test of a legal examination.

A colored man of rather doubtful appearance applied to a coal-dealer for a position as driver, says the Washington Post. On being asked for reference, he mentioned one of the dealer's old hands, who was called in and questioned as to the applicant's honesty.

The referee rubbed his chin meditatively for a moment, and said:

"Honest? Well, boss, dis yer man's honesty hab been proved befo' de court. He's been tried seben times fer stealin', and escaped ebery time."

And the man expressed surprise that this strong testimony did not secure him employment!

"I'm always perfectly impartial," said an old man, gravely, "but I do hate potato-bugs and furriners. So does many another kindly person.

An English bicyclist was coming, at great speed, down one of the steepest streets in Edinburgh, when his machine capsized, and landed him in the middle of the road. Two carters were passing, and they promptly came to his assistance.

"Maun, hoo did ye fa?" kindly inquired one of the carters. To which he received this answer:

"I was coming down that declivity with such velocity that I lost my gravity and fell on the macadamized road."

The carter turned from the unfortunate rider with insular contempt.

"C'wa,' Jock he said to his mate. "If I'd kent the cratur' wis a forriner, he would hae lain in the gutter lang eneuch for me."—Weekly Citizen.

"Give me a ham sandwich!" shouted the traveler at the bar of the refreshment room. Two seconds later he complained to the attendant, "That was the worst sandwich I ever had. No more taste than sawdust, and not big enough to see."

"You've et yer ticket," returned the attendant contemptuously, "this here's yer ham san'wich."

Makes the Weak Strong

The way in which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up people in run down or weakened state of health, conclusively proves the claim that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength from which there must follow a reaction of greater weakness than before, but in the most natural way Hood's Sarsaparilla overcomes that tired feeling, creates an appetite, purifies the blood, and in short, gives great bodily, nerve, mental and digestive strength.

"German Syrup"

Here is an incident from the South—Mississippi, written in April, 1890, just after the Grippe had visited that country. "I am a farmer, one of those who have to rise early and work late. At the beginning of last Winter I was on a trip to the City of Vicksburg, Miss., where I got well drenched in a shower of rain. I went home and was soon after seized with a dry, hacking cough. This grew worse every day, until I had to seek relief. I consulted Dr. Dixon who has since died, and he told me to get a bottle of Boschee's German Syrup. Meantime my cough grew worse and worse and then the Grippe came along and I caught that also very severely. My condition then compelled me to do something. I got two bottles of German Syrup. I began using them, and before taking much of the second bottle, I was entirely clear of the Cough that had hung to me so long, the Grippe, and all its bad effects. I felt tip-top and have felt that way ever since." PETER J. BRIALS, Jr., Cayuga, Hines Co., Miss.

The Cincinnati convention has Donnelly, and if his experience don't help them to straddle the issues before them what will?

Where is Rutherford B. Hays? He was president once. He ought to get a nomination, according to the present method.

We are in receipt of an invitation to the second annual commencement exercises of the normal school at Moorhead, May 26th to 29th. The graduating exercises occur Friday, May 29th. The Moorhead school is a good thing for Northern Minnesota.

Those farm names McDonold, our Eva, Erwin our Bill, Donnelly, our Ignatious, sound so green and farmlike that every Minnesotian trembles lest they may be thrawn into the political silo and after properly maturing be classed among the real farmers at the Cincinnati convention.

It it wonderful how the country press will belittle itself by echoing the sentiments of the twin city dailies. Better leave editorial columns blank than to make mere mocking birds of them. If an editor has no ideas of his own he should at least be careful what he borrows.

Queen Victoria and the Prince of Wales being sick, the British subjects think of their chances of soon seeing the Prince's son on the throne. There are many who would wish their country rid of their bloated royalty that draws more revenue from the people than a McKinley bill on a small scale.

Mr. Blaine is not the only man whose name is mentioned at this time in connection with the presidential nomination, and President Harrison will have more trouble from Gen. Alger's boom than the friends of Blaine can do. Gen. Alger's boom has been started in the South, and he will capture every delegate from the South unless things change.

The Northern Pacific road sends us a complimentary copy of their new book "A Ramble in Wonderland," by Albert B. Gutill, for which we tender thanks. The book, 107 pages, contains twenty-five illustrations of the highest order of merit, while the whole work is, both mechanically and in a literary sense, very artistic, describing the wonderful country which the N. P. traverses.

That village council of Pelican Rapids must be composed of either knaves or fools. We have known village councils that were particular and discriminating, but for a hoodlum council we need go no further than Pelican Rapids. The Pioneer, a bright weekly published there, has until recently done the village printing, but the council now sees fit to send the printing out of town. That is a little the smallest piece of work we have seen for many a day—the publisher of the Pioneer, Mrs. Rathbun, has our sympathy for having her lot cast among such parasites.

Grover Cleveland, the Wauter Van Twiller of the democratic party seems to be loosing ground daily. The sentiment of democrats is that they cannot afford to again put him against Harrison who judging from present appearances seems to be the choice of the republicans. With Harrison a candidate no factional fight will bob up to fracture the ranks of the party. The jealousy of many aspiring democrats will take from Grover Cleveland thousands of votes. What the democrats must do is select a man clean in public and private actions. Chief Justice Fuller, whose name has been suggested, would carry the rank and file of the democracy with a large number of republican stragglers thrown in.

The convention of united labor now assembled at Cincinnati is one of the most remarkable assemblies of modern history. Farmers, laboring men from all over the country, from the wheat fields of the west where are desciples of free trade and tariff reform, delegates from the Eastern manufacturing states where the goddes of protection counts her subjects by the million, third party advocates, others opposed to the idea—in fact representatives of every idea under the sun—assembled for the purpose of developing a plan by which these classes shall be mutually benefited. This accomplished, the earth is theirs. There are many vital subjects that might come within the scope of this organization, but they will likely all go down together in a huge maelstrom that may arise before the adjournment.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

The Challie Gown.

Here's to the girl whose dresses neat
  Would captivate a king—
Who always looks as fresn and sweet
  As blossoms in the spring.
She's sure to all the rest surpass
  In city or in town.
The Wise and winning pretty lass
  Who wears the challie gown.
Her dresses, soft and clinging show
  The out lines of her form,
And look as cool and neat as though
  The days were never warm.
What, though her face may homely be,
  Or sometimes wear a frown,
We're sure to love her when we see
  Her pretty challie gown.
Oh, girls! If you would win man's harts,
  And make them to confess,
No matter what your queenly arts,
  Be careful how you dress.
They, in your love] will seek to share,
  And on their knees go down,
If you are wise enough to wear
  A pretty challie gown.

A special from Duluth to the Minneapolis Journal says that arrangements having been completed, the Duluth, Red Lake Falls and Northern road will be built this summer. The line as now surveyed runs from Duluth to this point, thereby insuring for Red Lake Falls another line, a short cut to Duluth.

The schoolboard is moving slowly in the new schoolhouse matter. It would seem to us that the most common sense way, and what would satify the greater number of our citizens, would be to secure property over whose title there could be no dispute, and go ahead with the construction. As it is this is a senseless waste of time and the people are getting tired of it.

The impression seems to pervade the republican press that because Blaine is a member of the President's cabinet he properly must relinquish his presidential aspirations or retire from his present position. It seems to us strange that any one man should be considered as holding prior rights to another in such aspirations, unless the situation is changed by pledges or other such circumstances which do not exist in the present case.

Sunday, being Pentacost, special services were held at St. Mary's church at 10:30 a. m. The altars were decorated with green boughs and flowers. About two hundred people were in attendance. Rev. Ig. Balluff delivered a finished discourse on the subject "The working of the Holy Ghost in the church." The infallibility of the pope was also enlarged upon. Fr. Balluff's sermons always teem with historic facts that make them very instructive and interesting. The choir rendered Lambillote's Paschal mass and several selections.

That corn cannot be successfully raised in this part of the country has been repeatedly disproved by actual experience to the contrary. Fred Schmidt, one of the enterprising farmers of this vicinity, whose farm is half a mile from town on the north bank of the Red Lake river, says he raises a considerable crop every year. He says he has never yet had a failure. But corn requires a good deal of attention—no more here than any where else, however—and this fact may account in a large measure for its scarcity in this section. If sown in due season and properly cultivated it will succeed. The benefit to the soil from the rotation of crops is great.

CHAPTER II.

materially in cast and expression from the one bending over it. It was older, and there were in it lines of thought and care which neither life nor experience had traced upon the other. Dr. Royal No. 2 leaned back in his corner and let his thoughts run somewhat in this wise:

"A queer sort of happening, this—a fellow with my full name and profession besides, my double, in short, and cast on my hands in this overwhelming fashion. I'll be hanged if I can make it out! Out yonder I'd cut loose from him as quick as lightning—pass him on to the next lodge. A double would have to be the right sort of mascot to make it pay to tie to him out there. But here in Virginia"— He paused, the association of ideas producing a new thought. "Good Lord! suppose it should be! A similarity of names is no more a sign of kinship than a paper collar is a sign of a shirt; but it's safe to presuppose an indication in both cases. When that fellow pulls together I'm going to ask him who his grandfather was. If he's Virginia born he'll have plenty, and trot 'em out on small provocation. Royals are, or used to be, as plentiful as cockle burrs hereaway. My father—God rest him!—claimed to be one of a large family. It's comical, though!—my almost breaking my neck to catch this train for the apparent purpose of playing good Samaritan to a kinsman in a tight place."

His ruminations were interrupted by a mountaineer in the next seat. The man had come in at the last station, and was slowly taking stock of his surroundings. He slouched forward, with both arms on the back of Dr. Royal's seat, and glanced curiously at the sick man.

"Pretty bad off, your friend thar, I reckon," he suggested cheerfully.

"My stranger, you mean. Yes, he's a bit shaky. He's been overtaxing his strength, but he'll be better presently"—with professional mendacity in the presence of the patient. "Some of you keep an eye on him, will you? I must speak to the conductor."

He addressed nobody in particular, and his glance swept the car, but he knew he could depend on his fellow passengers to attend to his request. The young lady opposite turned an interested, sympathetic face in his direction at once, and the elder one assumed an alert attitude and held herself ready for emergencies.

Dr. Royal went forward into the smoking car. He had assumed control of the case with constitutional impetuosity, and now set about ordering it in accordance with his own judgment. The important—nay, the imperative—step, to his mind, was the removal of his patient, as speedily as might be, from the jolting discomfort of the train to some place where rest and quiet might be obtained. He questioned the conductor as to the capabilities of their next station, and learned, to his satisfaction, that twenty minutes would put them in Matoacca, a good sized town among the mountains. When, however, he announced his determination to remove the sick man to a hotel and stop over with him until his people could be summoned, the official demurred and suggested that the patient himself should be consulted.

"What for?" demanded Royal. "Every mile he travels is another nail in his coffin. He's bound to know that as well as I do. Didn't you say he had been smashed up? I don't know the extent of the damage yet, but I guess it's considerable; and he has lessened his chances by this journey. That fellow shall be undressed, overhauled and put to bed before two hours have passed, as sure as my name is Hart Royal. That's all there is about it. He'll have a tough fight for his life anyhow, and a losing fight, without some help."

The conductor caught at the name. "Royal," he repeated; "that's the name on his traps. He was put under my care special, you know. Are you kin to one another?"

"God knows!" Royal replied, with a smile. "It isn't at all unlikely, if his people should be native Virginians. Mine came from hereaway, and we have the same name all through, which don't seem natural for mere coincidence. I'll look after him a bit on the chance that it may be so. Blood's said to be thicker than water."

The man still hesitated.

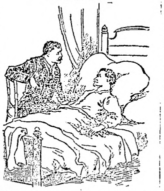
"He was in the devil of a swivet to get on," he objected. "It looks sort o' mean to balk him, without giving him a show."

Royal struck in imperiously: "Something a damned sight more serious than delay is going to happen if he isn't balked. I ought to know what I'm talking about, I reckon. I've been at the trade long enough to diagnose a case." Then he added more pacifically: "I know what's on your mind. I heard what you said to the fellow in the other car, and saw the man's badge, too. It's all right. This affair is as much my business as 'tis yours, and on the same ground—more, perhaps, if he joined the lodge in Philadelphia. Most 'meds' do."

Then followed certain communications between the men which resulted in the complete withdrawal of the official protest.

"All right, sir," he assented cordially. "You are the best judge, of course, and, as you say, it's as much your business as 'tis mine. You understand why I was obliged to hold back at first. The poor fellow seemed so set on gettin' on, and I'd been charged to help him."

Royal nodded. "He's too used up to be set on anything now," he remarked. And then he went back into the other car.



"I know that I'm to be married before twelve o'clock to-morrow."

To precipitate one's self into the lives of other people, while in itself a simple matter, not infrequently involves consequences sufficiently complex to form a puzzle, the disentanglement of which will constitute a life work. It may fall naturally into the order of things to board a train like an acrobat, and, when there, to assume control and direction of any stranger whose mental or bodily condition may appeal to human or professional sympathies; but when the life thus touched turns, octopus like, and clamps one with insistent and coercive arms and threatens to incorporate one with its own organism, the universally admitted fact of human interdependence loses some of its beauty, and most people prefer to treat it as a simple abstraction.

Should an exception prove the above rule, it is dubbed "a survival" or "a bit of knight errantry," and the perpetrator is regarded as an anomaly, and imposed upon as though he were a fool.

The change from the train to a hotel bedroom was made as speedily and deftly as possible, and the sick man stood it, on the whole, better than his self constituted protector had dared to hope. That his namesake possessed unusual strength of will Dr. Royal had been quick to recognize, and his sympathies were touched by the gallant endeavor the poor fellow made to second every outside effort for his relief.

"By George!" he inwardly commented, with the unconscious egotism which leads us to appropriate likeness in aught that seems to us admirable, "the fellow has good grit. He must be kin to me after all."

In taking upon himself such arbitrary direction of a stranger's affairs Dr. Royal established his position, both to himsel and to his patient, by setting forth, in addition to the professional bond between them, the brotherhood engendered by common membership of a sacred order. Either fact furnished, to his mind, both a reason and an excuse for conduct which, he smilingly admitted, might strike a superficial observer as uncommonly like officiousness.

"It's fortunate that I'm occasionally justified by professional and other considerations," he pursued, as he made his patient comfortable, "for I'm a born intermeddler. Other men are satisfied with poking a finger or two into neighboring pasties. I grab the dish."

"A good thing for the original dishholder too, sometimes," the patient responded, weak enough to feel the relief of divided responsibility. "I've a lonesome sort of conviction that my pasty will turn out a sodden failure without pretty vigorous stirring from an outside spoon. The fact is, I'm in an uncommonly deep hole, and shall be thankful for a friendly hand to pull me out. You must not let me interfere with your own plans, however. It seems I've got to rest temporarily or else eternally; but that's no reason you should be inconvenienced."

"That's all right," Royal declared. "Don't vex your mind on my score. I'm holiday making, and my time is at my own disposal. There's nothing to prevent my stopping over a week if I want to. Then I don't mind telling you that I'm interested in your case—would like to watch it a bit, in short. Force of habit, you see; there's nothing like it, eh, doctor? You know how it is yourself."

He talked cheerily, kind words overlying a kind intention, and both carrying soothing to the sick man, as he meant that they should. The rules of the order enjoined assistance in cases like the present, and he was, moreover, in a mood for being helpful, or, as he might have dubbed it, officious. Since the partial examination to which he had subjected the patient his interest and sympathy had deepened. The outlook was more serious than he had supposed—was so serious, in fact, that all thought of continuation of the journey must be put aside. As he talked, Dr. Royal turned over in his mind the advisability of summoning the sick man's friends without loss of time, and only awaited an opening to request the necessary information concerning them casually, as it were.

A clear coal fire burned in the grate, night was drawing in, and outside it was cold and dark. The flames danced up and down, violet where the fuel was only half ignited, and pale yellow down in the hollows where the heat was greatest; shadows played on the walls and the sick man's bed, for there was no light in the room save that given by the fire. The face on the pillow was well nigh invisible, save when the flames flared up, when it would start out distinct and prominent, the eyes wide open and watchful.

"Doctor, will you make a light?"

Royal started. He had thought the patient asleep. As he complied with the request he remarked, quite carelessly:

"By the way, friend, won't your people be expecting you? It may bother them, not understanding about the delay, you know. Women always put themselves in a fret. If you'll give me the address before you go to sleep I'll wire for you."

The answer was irrelevant:

"What time is it?"

Dr. Royal gave the desired information.

"Half-past 6," the sick man repeated. "And the train leaves at 4:30 a. m. Nearly eight hours to rest and pull myself together. No; it won't be worth while to telegraph, thank you. They couldn't get it in time to make new arrangements. There's no telegraph office at their station, and a message would go past and have to be sent back by mail. It would reach them too late to do any good. I'll just rest a bit and go on by that 4:30 train. It's the only way."

He spoke slowly, as one who figures out a situation.

Royal faced round to the bed.

"Are you aware of your condition?" he demanded gravely.

"Perfectly," the other replied. "I've watched the case from the beginning."

It seemed hideous, this turning of one's science upon one's self; but neither man appeared to find it so. The one doctor made the statement and the other received it quite as a matter of course.

"You know, then," Royal proceeded, speaking plainly because of the urgency of the case, "just what your chance is worth, even with all the help you can get from rest and quiet. To continue this journey will be suicide."

The eyes on the pillow met his resolutely, and the jaw squared itself.

"I know that I'm to be married before 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that I've got to be on hand, dead or alive."

Here was an unlooked for complication. Royal's brows swept together in perplexity. It was an awkward situation, he was willing to admit; but with him the professional instinct was dominant.

"It can't be done," he announced decidedly. "Your life won't be worth an instant's purchase if you quit that bed. It's an ugly tangle, but it won't help matters to invite death in to untie it. Delay may mean an hour or two of anxiety and mortification for the lady, but it means a deuced deal more for you. And it would be a poor sort of woman who wouldn't gladly submit to the one for the sake of the other. In short, the case is in my hands, and I don't choose to have it wrecked. Give me the address and I'll telegraph at once. I'll write, too, if that will make your mind easier. Anything else is out of the question. I'm going to give you an opiate now, and you must compose yourself and go to sleep."

The sick man smiled, but his expression lost none of its resolution. It amused him to hear the tone taken with him which he himself was prone to take with his own patients: it was like an unexpected glimpse of his own reflection. As for his chances, he could estimate their worth far more accurately than could his monitor; his opportunity for observation had been greater, and, as he had stated, he had followed the case from the beginning. To his mind the question involved was less one of choice between life and death than an estimate of endurance under diverse conditions and of hours ere death should come. His pain had been lessening for several hours, and a torpor was gradually stealing over his lower limbs, whose significance was unmistakable. His brain was clear and abnormally active, and he involuntarily trusted to his strength of will to clinch his grasp on life until his purpose should be accomplished. Like most forceful men he cut his margins close, and sometimes neglected to make sufficient allowance for nature.

He waved the opiate aside.

"I don't intend to sleep yet," he declared. "Prop me up a trifle, please, and give me something to fight this cursed weakness. You look a fellow to be trusted, aside from the order, and I want you to help instead of hindering me. My marriage before 12 o'clock to-morrow isn't simply a question of anxiety or mortification to a woman, though that would be bad enough. It's a question of food, raiment, hope, joy—all the things which would go to make life full and, in a measure, satisfying, as set against the devil's grind of poverty and dependence, and for a woman physically incapacitated for holding her own in the scramble."

Royal put the rejected opiate aside and did as the patient requested. Then he drew a chair to the bedside and composed himself to listen. There would be no rest for the bruised body, he knew, until the mind should be at liberty to rest also. He must get the lead, whatever it might be, transferred to his own shoulders, or the case would be beyond his skill. It must be done quietly, too, for excitement might bring on internal hemorrhage, of which there was imminent danger.

"Take it easy," he said gently. "I'm going to help you. Put what you've got to say in as few words as possible and then leave the matter to me. You've overtaxed your strength already, but there isn't any hurry now. We've got eight hours before that train goes. But first I want to suggest something. Wouldn't a will set the matter right for the young lady?"

The patient shook his head.

"Not mine," he answered. "I'm worth nothing outside of my profession. It's a worse tangle than you think. Listen. This is how the affair stands."

Divested of all superfluity of detail, for which there was neither time nor strength, the facts of the case were these: Some fifty years before there had been a quarrel in one branch of the Royal family over the disposition of certain property vested in northern securities. The family consisted of two brothers and a sister, and the property belonged to a maiden aunt who made her home with them. The aunt's affections

It behooves the government of the United States to take care of this country's trade with Hawaii. It is immensely valuable and the Germans and English are anxious to secure it. The people of the islands prefer to do business with the United States.

The German government is beginning the war upon France by striking at her trade—making one tariff for French products and another for those of other countries. Probably the sooner these two nations get to fighting the sooner will a real peace be restored.

It is pointed out that a great many distinguished soldiers have attained to unusual length of years. Moltke was one. Wellington, who died at 83, and Lord Gough, at 90, are instances in the British service; Marshals McMahon (83), Soult (82) and Grouchy (81), in the French.

It is said to be in Decatur county, Indiana, 11 miles south and two miles west of Greensburg, 40 rods south of the half-mile post on the line that divides sections 17 and 20, in township nine north, range nine east. There is nothing like accuracy.

Osman Pasha, the hero of Plevna, is now reaping the rich reward of his military career. He has been appointed sealer in the kitchen of his unspeakable majesty, the sultan. Warriors who serve the Turk can always depend on a warm berth.

"The English-speaking world," says the London Spectator, "will never read the story of the rebellion without a thrill of pride and exultation." It may be remembered, incidentally, that at the time of the rebellion that portion of the English-speaking world the boundaries of which are coincident with those of the British islet was feeling a thrill of exultation from an entirely different motive. England has changed since the days when she broke neutral faith to lend aid to an incipient revolt.

The Californians are not at all satisfied with the recent bulletin on truck farming. They say that it contains as many flagrant errors in regard to California as the one issued some time ago concerning viticulture in California. The fact is that statistics are very hard to collect on the Pacific coast, owing to the vast area that it is necessary to cover. One of the census experts declares that there are only 110 acres of asparagus in the whole state, but this would scarcely suffice for the quantity of that product which is sent to the eastern states.

The bitter warfare has for a long time been waged between the editors of the Washburn papers has culminated in a libel suit. The Leader charged J. E. Britton, editor of the Mail, with committing the crime of arson and other offenses while he was a clerk of the Berthold Indian agency, and on this account Britton brought an action against his rival. Several prominent politicians of the state are mixed up in the fight.

He is seventy-two hours ahead of the authorities, who are now after him. He got the start of his creditors by saying that he was going out to his farm to put in a large crop.

The Northwestern live stock company, which was organized at Bismarck, has made its first purchase of sheep. It has secured a well graded lot of 8,000 in Oregon, all of which will be placed with farmers in this locality. Sheep are in good demand at $4 per head and upward, there being an advance of 25 per cent within the year. Farmers experienced difficulty in procuring well bred males, and Eastern breeders can obtain good prices for choice stock. The cattle business has recovered from the depression and is again very active.

A good flow was struck in the Chamberlain artesian well at a depth at a trifle under 800 feet. A test showed a force of about sixty pounds to the square inch without the water being completely shut off in an inch pipe. The work is being continued, and it is believed a flow of unusual power will be secured.

Too Many Bears.

A young huntsman of Helena, Montana, was following the upper course of the Milk River, and came suddenly face to face with a bear. He brought his rifle to his shoulder, took careful aim, and shot the bear dead. The next moment a second bear appeared from a rocky den. The young hunter again made a successful shot. To his surprise a third bear came out of the den. He killed this one also, and before he had time to remove from the spot, bruin number four appeared. It was exciting sport to be sure, but there were more bears than he cared to see at one time. However, he made a good shot, and bruin tumbled over making four dead bears.

While the huntsman stood watching his game, a fifth bear, larger than any of the previous ones, came out of the den and rushed forward. The young man fired, but missed; and before he could reload, the infuriated beast was upon him! One blow of the huge paw sent the gun flying from his grasp, but he quickly drew his hunting-knife, and wouned bruin in the neck. In doing this he received a severe squeeze from the brute, and a fearful bite on the shoulder. Then he lost consciousness,

When he recovered his senses, his horse was between him and the bear. The horse was kicking viciously, and bruin was making but feeble resistance, and soon lumbered off into the brush, The hunter was badly shaken up, and the wound in his shoulder was exceedingly painful. With difficulty he mounted his horse, which was quite unhurt, and rode to a place of shelter a few miles further on, where his injuries received attention and his game was secured.—Youth's Companion.

Widow: "Take her! She's yours!"

ON ANOTHER CHASE.

The Cruiser Charleston Again Racing Over the Ocean in Search of the Itata.

By Swift Sailing and Good Luck There Is Some Prospect of a Capture.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—The navy department to-day received a dispatch that the Charleston sailed southward from Acapulco last evening, leaving the Esmeralda in port.

There was no word of the Itata. The presumption is that the Charleston commander was satisfied that the Itata had passed Acapulco either before his arrival there, or while he lay in port, and that he has resumed the long chase. It is estimated that the Itata has been stealing along at about seven knots, and as she was ten days out last Friday night, she should at that time have been just at Acapulco, where it is reported from that place that she met the Esmeralda.

She is a much smaller vessel than the Esmeralda and burns much less coal. It is regarded as within the probabilities that the latter vessel might have supplied her with this necessary article, which would account for the strait the war ship is now in respecting a further supply of coal.

If it be true that the Itata was off Acapulco Friday night, she had two full days' start of the Charleston when the latter started again in pursuit last night. This is about the same lead that she had when she started from San Francisco, so that it does not appear that the case is any nearer a conclusion. But if the two vessels now follow the same course, the Charleston, steaming at fourteen knots, should come up with the Itata by to-morrow night. This event, of course, is based upon the assumption, which is not founded upon a strong probability, that the two vessels are steering exactly the same course.

If the Charleston passes the Itata, the next port which they are likely to be heard from is Panama, about 1,200 miles from Acapulco, or Payta, Peru, still further down the coast. As it is, the vessels have probably covered less than half the distance to Iquique, the nearest Chilian port.

FORCED TO APOLOGIZE.

The Uncomfortable Position in Which the Insurgent Vessel Was Placed.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 20.—A copy of the Chilian Times, which reached here by the steamer San Blas, announces that by special agreement with Germany, Great Britain is taking German interests in Chili under her protection until the arrival of three German warships, which are now en route.

The Times says the Warspite forced an apology out of the insurgent man-of-war Bianco Encalado just before the latter was sunk by the torpedo boats. The Blanco was engaged in the blockading of Iquique, when she, with other vessels of the blockading fleet, ran out of coal. The English and German merchantmen were lying side by side, both coal laden. The rebel fleet took hold of them on the pretense that they were in range in the event of firing, and towed them out to sea, despite the protests of the captains. Out of range of the fort's guns the insurgent made a forced purchase of such coal as they needed.

They voluntarily paid an extravagant price for it, but nevertheless the captains of the vessels reported the matter to the British admiral, Hotham, who gave the Blanco the option of apologizing or fighting inside of twenty-four hours. It was then 11:30 a. m. Precisely at noon the Blanco ran up the British and German flags above the rebel standard and fired a royal salute.

The coal would have been replaced and the ships towed back to their former anchorange but for the fact that most of the coal had been burned and the two merchant ships had no further business at Iquique.

KILLED BY LOCUSTS.

Terrible Death of a Prominent French Naturalist.

ALGIERS, May 20—The French savant, M. Kunckel Herculais, the president of the ethnological society, who was employed on the government mission of investigating the locust plague in this province, has met a horrible death.

While examining a deposit of locusts' eggs at the village of Sidieral, he was overcome with fatigue and the heat and fell asleep on the ground. While sleeping he was attacked by a swarm of locusts.

On awakening he struggled desperately to escape from the living flood. He set fire to the insect-laden bushes near him, but all his efforts proved ineffectual, and when finally the locusts left the spot his corpse was found.

CLUBBED TO DEATH.

A Minneapolis Woman Murdered in Chicago.

CHICAGO, May 20.—Alice Martin, twenty-eight years old, was found murdered in her apartments early this morning. She had been clubbed to death. J. H. Painter, who lived with the woman, was locked up on suspicion of being the murderer. Painter says that he went to the theater last night and did not return home till after 12 o'clock. He says he found the Martin woman lying dead on the floor. She was lying in a pool of blood. One side of her face was badly crushed, and her head was cut in several places. Tenants in the same house say that they heard the woman and some man quarrel during the early part of the evening. The murdered woman's parents live at Minneapolis.

KEPT VERY QUIET.

A Railroad Accident in Which a Number of Lives Were Lost.

KANSAS CITY, May 20.—Mrs. A. A. Center of Pottsdam, N. Y., who has been visiting at the home of W. W. Morgan, says that a bridge on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroad at Albuquerque fell last Friday, carrying with it a passenger train that had been two hours in advance of the train by which she was traveling. The latter train was flagged and the passengers were obliged to cross the cut which the bridge spanned and meet a train on the other side. Mrs. Center says that it was reported that twelve or fourteen people were killed. No telegraphic report of such a wreck has been received.

Not Looking for Office.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, May 20. —Ex-Gov. A. R. McGill is expected to arrive in Washington in a few days. He is a member of the board to visit the West Point military academy, who are ordered to report at the academy on June 1. The governor's arrival here will be the signal for a number of reports that he is after some office or desires to take a hand in Minnesota patronage. Capt. J. K. Moore, now appointment clerk in the treasury department, who was McGill's private secretary, says there is no truth in the report whatever that McGill had any desire to be postmaster at St. Paul.

THIRD PARTY MOVE.

Delegates Assembling at Cincinnati for the National Union Conference to Begin To-Day.

CINCINNATI, May 20.—The three or four hundred delegates and others in attendance upon the National Union conference, which begins its sessions in this city to-morrow, were reinforced this morning by the arrival of a special train bearing ten car loads of citizens from Kansas and other Western points, and it is estimated that there are now here nearly 1,300 people representing at least two-thirds of the states of the Union.

This morning's train brought Ignatius Donnelly of Minnesota, Norton, of the Chicago Sentinel; Elder, speaker of the Kansas house of representatives; Congressman-elect McKeighan of Nebraska, Robb of Iowa, Wood of Kansas, Snyder of Indiana, Powderly, Hayes and Devlin of Detroit.

Most of the organizations expected are well represented and, there does not seem to be any apprehension on the part of those present that anything will occur to mar the harmony essential to a perfect understanding among so many different organizations. It is claimed by the leaders that the representatives of these bodies have come here in a spirit of concession, and that they have not brought any "bobbies" with them; and such, so far as indications go, appear to be the case.

There promises to be a breeze over the delegation from Minnesota, headed by Ignatius Donnelly. Miss McDonald and several others will endeavor to secure recognition by the conference, but Donnelly and his followers do not appear to be worried about the situation, and claim that the opposition comes from persons hostile to the movement, who are acting under orders from

THE "WHEAT RING" OF MINNESOTA.

There is considerable comment on the reported opposition of Senator Peffer to the "third party" movement, and it is openly stated by Capt. Powers and others that it would be better for Mr. Peffer and other gentlemen holding official positions to listen to the voice of the people than to try to dictate the course to be pursued by the conference in regard to the formation of a third party.

There is, however, a division of sentiment on the third party question, but the drift seems to be favorable to such action as will insure the nomination of a national ticket in 1892. This conference will not undertake to make any nomination, but an effort will be made to get things into such shape that it will be an easy matter to take action in that regard next year. It is denied that the South is so strongly opposed to a third party as has been represented.

FROM THEIR FRIENDS.

An Array of Presents Received by President and Mrs. Harrison.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—On Saturday, when Mrs. Harrison had her trunks unpacked, all the souvenirs of her journey were brought to light—she has them all arranged on the tables upstairs in the corridor, and they make a glittering array of precious metals.

The presents made to the president are also among the display, and between them all the number must certainly reach 400. On one long table are arranged all the gold and silver souvenirs.

In Utah the president was given the freedom of the state in the presentation of a silver map of the state nearly a foot square. In San Francisco the invitation to the Palace hotel banquet was on a thick gold card; the menu card was another gold plate, and the freedom of the city was on a superbly wrought square of gold. From the launching of the Monterey Mrs. Harrison has several elegant mementoes. One is a purple velvet sash, another is a large silver ladle with a picture of the ship in the bowl, and the third a hammer made from one of the first rivets placed in the ship.

Mrs. Harrison also has a spoon to show for nearly every town and city she visited in the silver states. From different cities on the coast she has elegant gold and silver knives and spoons made in odd and attractive shapes. A miner's lamp of silver was a present in another place, and little dishes of silver filagree work a reminder of another.

GOOD NEWS.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—That the Italian government is endeavoring to check the tide of emigration to the United States is shown by the issuance of a circular by the Italian minister of the interior department prefects of the kingdom for the restriction of such immigration so far as minors are concerned.

A copy of this circular received at the treasury department shows that minors will not be allowed to leave the kingdom when not accompanied by relatives or guardians, except on production of proper shipping articles, and such documents will be required also in case the minor is accompanied by a relative or guardian who can neither read nor write. Minors eighteen years of age will not be allowed to emigrate, except on specific authority by the minister of war.

Corte, Italian consul at New Orleans, has arrived here, but declines to talk, pleading the fatigue of his trip. He will call on the marquis Imperiali during the day. The department of state has not yet received a request from Gov. Nichols to recall Consul Corte's exequatur, but there is little likelihood that he will ever again represent his country in the United States.

WILL NOT RESIGN.

Commissioner Raum Sets at Rest All Rumors to the Contrary.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—In an interview to-night, Gen. Raum, commissioner of pensions, stated emphatically that he did not intend to resign.

He said that his relations with Presiden Harrison and Secretary Noble were entirely pleasant, and there was no quarrel between the secretary and himself.

The commissioner then said that he wished "the public to understand that there is a coterie of men in Washington, a few of whom are in the pension office, who have formed a conspiracy to break down his character as a public officer and as a private citizen, and to bring the pension office into public disrepute." He added: "I am not to be driven from the pension office by these men. I have devoted my best thought and energy to its organization, and the bureau is at the present time one of the most efficient working organizations of the government."

Quay on Deck Again.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, May 20. —Matt Quay and Tim Byrnes met here last night. This conference, however, was of but so much importance as the conference between the president and Senator Quay to-day. Quay has a number of small jobs to fix up with the president, and notwithstanding the fact that he has been turned down in regard to several appointments in Pennsylvania, he has never exhibited any soreness and is always ready to reach out and get what will be allowed him. It is given out that even if Byrnes does represent the league Quay is of more importance at the White House than the Minnesota man.

A SOAP BUBBLE BURST.

TRICK OF A PROTECTIONIST PAPER EXPOSED.

The Chicago High Tariff Organ Tries to Prove the Tariff Is Not a Tax—Pears' Soap Sold as an Advertisement—A Liberal Offer Not Accepted—A Tariff Editor in a Hole.

The protectionist organs are hard pressed to prove that the tariff is not a tax. One would suppose that the fall of two cents a pound on sugar the very day when the duty was removed would silence them forever. But the old song still goes on, "The tariff is not a tax."

These organs even try to get what they call proofs that the consumer does not pay the tariff tax. The proofs they print are extremely ridiculous, and they are often tripped up on the spot. The Chicago Inter Ocean has recently suffered this fate.

Everybody knows that large retail dry-goods stores often sell some article far below cost in order to advertise their business and attract custom. The tariff editor of the Inter Ocean not long ago found some merchant doing this with Pears' soap, and instantly he uncorked his ink-bottle and wrote a paragraph to show how the foreigner pays the tax. This paragraph made a choice pin-hook bait with which to delude the ignorant, and it was extensively copied into the protection organs of the country.

In the meantime this morsel came to the notice of Messrs. Gaunt & Janvier, of New York, who handle every pound of Pears' soap imported into the United States. At once they sent the following letter to the Inter Ocean:

Chicago Inter Ocean, Chicago, Ill.:

DEAR SIRS—Our attention has been called to a cutting from your editorial of March 31, in which you say that "Pears' soap, English made, and sold in England at 12 cents per cake, pays 20 per cent. duty for admission to the American market, and is sold there regularly at 10 cents and occasionally at 5 cents. Hence, 'the tariff duty has not added to the price.'"

So intelligent a paper as yours will surely want to be put right on several misstatements made in the above. The soap is not sold in England at 12 cents a cake, but generally from 7 to 8 cents. The soap does not pay 20 per cent. duty for admission, but 15 cents per pound specific. It is not sold regularly in the American market at 10 cents.

You evidently have assumed that the marked retail price, 6d., is the price at which the unscented soap is sold in London. It is cut there as well as here to near cost price. We sell to jobbers here at precisely the English price plus duty and shipping charges. See price list inclosed.

We have yet to find importers who do not add to their imported goods the actual duty which they pay the United States government, and which, of course, the people have to pay back to the importer.

The net price of the unscented soap in London is about 78 cents United States money; one dozen soap weighs 2¼ pounds, and upon this the United States government assesses 15 cents per pound, or 33¾ cents. This is added to the cost of the soap, and in addition there is also added the cost of the United States consul fees in London, and the cost of clearance from the custom house in landing here. These, together with the freight, make $1.16, at which price we sell to jobbers.

We have known Pears' soap to be sold in Chicago at 2 cents per cake, or 48 cents per dozen, for which the purchaser paid us in New York $1.16 per dozen, he himself paying the freight to Chicago; he therefore sold the goods at much less than half the cost to him, and he seemed to think this was good advertising.

It seems to us that you have taken an unfortunate example to illustrate your argument. The tariff is unquestionably a tax, and is just as surely added to the cost of the goods as the freight is added to the beef in New York when brought from Chicago, or grain from Chicago, or oranges which are brought from California.

You must know that the selling price of an article at a certain point is based, first upon the selling price at the place of production or manufacture, plus transportation and other charges.

People, of course, may sell a certain article for less than cost, but that the great bulk of business is not done in this way goes without saying. We are, gentlemen, respectfully yours, GAUNT & JANVIER.

The Inter Ocean's tariff man replied to this letter as follows:

Messrs. Gaunt & Janvier, 365–367 Canal street, New York;

GENTLEMEN—Your favor of date 6th of April has been referred to me. The firm mentioned by the Inter Ocean as selling Pears' soap at 5 cents a cake assures me that it did not sell at a loss; that it does not buy from Pears' New York agency; that it purchases surplus lots of all sorts of goods, Pears' soap included, at nominal rates. Tariff very seldom, very seldom, indeed, is added to cost. The Welsh tin-plate makers, who have given assurance of their willingness to supply American dealers with plates at old rates under an increased duty, will enlighten you on this point. Respectfully, JOHN W. TINDALL, Tariff Editor.

Mr. Gaunt replied to the above in the following "put-up-or-shut-up" style:

Mr. John W. Tindall, Tariff Editor Chicago Inter Ocean, Chicago, Ill.:

DEAR SIR—I am in receipt of your letter addressed to Gaunt & Janvier. In our private letter I called your attention to the fact that the three statements which you made in regard to Pears' soap were not true, and that the inferences you drew are false. In your letter of April 10 you evade the issue, but I assume that you have been imposed upon.

You say that the firm sells Pears' soap at 5 cents per cake, and that it did not sell at a loss.

Now, I will buy twenty-five thousand dollars' ($25,000) worth at 6 cents per cake; this will then afford the firm $5,000 profit.

Further, when this purchase is made, I will give such an order for advertising to the Inter Ocean as shall make it worth while to have started the discussion.

If the source of information upon which you make your assertion that the "Tariff very seldom, very seldom, indeed, is added to the cost," be as inaccurate as the source of information about Pears' soap, it is without the pale of discussion, and it is hardly worth while to go to Wales until we have settled the present. Respectfully,

JAMES GAUNT,
Of the firm of Gaunt & Janiver.

No answer has been made to Mr. Gaunt's liberal offer; and it can safely be assumed that the Inter Ocean man "feels like a fool." Meantime the country press of the protectionist persuasion go on repeating his fib as a part of protectionist's gospel. A lie travels with "seven-league boots."

The Price of Beef.

The wholesale price of beef in Chicago has advanced about 33⅓ per cent. within the last month. The cause of the advance is said to be the scarcity not only of good cattle but a general scarcity of all grades and the advance in price of corn.

So far as known, not even the blindest protection journal has been so idiotic as to claim that this rise is due to McKinley's doubling the duty. He changed the duty from one cent per pound to two cents. The Treasury reports do not mention any beef among the imports into this country. But they show that last year we exported more than $35,000,000 worth of live cattle and beef.

McKinley's beef duty was only made to fool the farmers.

"Serves Mexico's Interests."

Is not this too bad? A dispatch from the City of Mexico announces that since we have abolished the duty on sugar Mexico has begun to export sugar to this country. "During the present year," the dispatch goes on, "there will be a large increase in area devoted to agriculture, and especially by sugar planters, who are everywhere prosperous. The trade of the country is increasing daily."

Whenever anybody in this country talks about reducing duties, the McKinleyites instantly pop up on all sides and shout that he "serves foreign interests," that he is working against the interests of his native land, and charges are made that he has in his pockets Cobden Club gold. These McKinleyites hunt up all the news they can find and print it in their papers showing how McKinley's high duties on foreign-made goods have closed up factories in Europe and thrown thousands of workmen out of employment. Thereupon they smile very broadly, rub their hands in glee, and exclaim, "Europe's loss is our gain."

But where we remove a duty, as we have just done with the sugar tax, and the removal of it brings renewed prosperity to other nations, must it not inevitably follow, upon the protectionists' argument, that we have done a very bad day's work for our own country? If "Europe's loss is our gain," it must be true that Mexico's gain is our loss. But are our people suffering a loss? On the contrary, they are buying their sugar two cents per pound cheaper than before the removal of the duty. Who concerns himself that Mexico is helped? Let Mexico enjoy to the full every advantage that our vast free-sugar market gives it; no man except a protectionist, not even the veriest ignoramus in the world, could suppose that we have given Mexico that advantage at our own expense.

Trade, like charity, blesses him that gives and him that takes. Trade must be beneficial to both buyer and seller, or trade ceases—a principle constantly and persistently ignored by the whole school of McKinleyites. Therefore we can say to the Mexicans, "Dump your pauper-made sugar upon our markets as rapidly and in as great quantities as possible; the more the better. The cheaper sugar is the better for our people, and we don't begrudge your 'paupers' the pennies which they earn in producing it."

Tin-Plate Lying.

McKinley's high duty on tin-plate goes into effect July 1, and the importers have been bringing in enormous quantities of plate in order to save the extra duty.

How imports have grown may be seen from the following table:

IN THE LAST TWO YEARS.

The figures for April, May and June will be still more remarkable. The increase from forty-eight million pounds in March, 1890, to 101 million in March, 1891, shows how tin plate with a tax of 1 cent per per pound is preferred in the market above plate taxed 2 2-10 cents. If the foreigner pays this tax, is there any reason why our tin plate dealers should be in such a hurry to fill their warehouses?

This inrush of tin plate from England shows clearly where the large stocks now in our markets come from. Yet the lying New York Tribune has the brazenness to make the following remarks in commenting upon the reports that the Welch tin plate mills are to shut down on July 1 for one month:

"Why, the McKinley bill was going to raise the price of tin plate! Don't you remember the free trade tears that were shed over the 'little tin pail of the laborer?' And now to learn that the American market in six months' time has been so far filled by American tin plate as to compel the Welch trust to shut down to prevent a glut of the market This is sad for the free trader."

The only evidence that American tin plate is filling the market is found in the shape of tin plate bills of fare at protectionist banquets, and sheets of tin hung in the windows of protectionist newspapers. In no American city has American made tin plate been offered for sale in "commercial quantities."

The Reciprocity Principle.

Our imports of coffee from Venezuela during the fiscal year 1890 reached a value of $9,662,207, making her the most formidable competitor of Brazil, from whom we purchased $45,664,127 worth. Negotiations are now going on to form a reciprocity arrangement with the United States, and it is said there is among the Venezuelans a wholesome fear of having the duty imposed upon coffee at the beginning of next year if no agreement is made in the meantime.

According to the terms of McKinley reciprocity, it is made the duty of the President next January to put a duty of three cents a pound on coffee coming from countries which by that time have not given us a reciprocity arrangement satisfactory to him.

This is the "reciprocity principle." We tax ourselves to punish the people who will not buy from us!

Selling Farm Implements.

"United States Treasury reports do not lie. The one just issued dealing with our exports and imports shows that whereas in March, 1890, we sold American agricultural implements to other nations to the value of $387,255. In March, 1891, we sold these implements abroad to the value of $821,721. This does not look as though the McKinley tariff was checking our exports."

No; but it looks as though our manufacturers of farm implements, with a protection of 45 per cent., were succeeding pretty well in enlarging their foreign market by their method of marking special discounts in that market below home prices. Why then do they need protection at home?

ONE of the strong objections to the tariff system as a means to raise revenues is the enormous expense of collection. A Philadelphia paper reports that the customs receipts at that city now amount to less than $270,000 a month, and that the expense of running the Custom House averages $100,000 a month. It is said that under the old sugar duty the Government paid not far from $160,000 a year for weighing sugar alone at the three ports of New York, Philadelphia and Boston. Is there not a less expensive way to get revenues?

President vs. Tariff-Maker.

When President Harrison was in the Pacific States he made allusion in nearly all his speeches to the Nicaragua canal. He thought it would prove of great advantage to those States by facilitating trade with States lying on the Atlantic.

If the protective theory is sound, ought not the President, on the other hand, to have offered his sympathies to the people on the Pacific? The completion of the canal will "flood" California and neighboring States with cheap Eastern goods. Wages are very much lower in the manufacturing States of the East than in the far West. So great is the difference, in fact, that the Pacific people might well call our goods "pauper-made."

Now there is nothing which so paralyzes the protectionist soul as the fear of the "cheap pauper-made goods of Europe." Nothing, to his mind, threatens such dire ruin to this country, and his patriotism demands a high McKinley wall to shut out these goods, or, at any rate, to make them dear.

The building of the Nicaragua canal will make all kinds of Eastern manufactures vastly cheaper on the Pacific slope. Yet, strange to say, the President waxed eloquent over the canal, and the Pacific audiences applauded warmly. If protection is true, how can the people of the far West bear to think of cloth, iron manufactures, steel rails, window glass, etc., coming in at the Golden Gate at prices far lower than they have ever known? Will it not "ruin" California? Will it not make the people there "cheap men?"

As if all this were not enough, the President even spoke eloquently about extending our foreign trade. Here is one of his sentences: "I believe we have come to a time when we should choose whether we will continue to be non-participants in the commerce of the world, or will now vigorously, with the push and energy which our people have shown in other lines of enterprise, claim our share of the world's commerce."

Now, this is diametrically opposed to McKinleyism. In his speech a year ago on his tariff bill, McKinley said:

"If our trade and commerce are increasing and profitable within our own borders, what advantage can come from passing by confessedly the best market, that we may reach the poorest by distant seas? In the foreign market the profit is divided between our own citizen and the foreigner, while with the trade and commerce among ourselves the profit is kept in our own family and increases our national wealth, and promotes the welfare of the individual citizen."

New Hampshire's Woods.

It is a hopeful sign that New Hampshire seems to be recognizing the commercial value of her mountain forests, and the movement in favor of establishing a permanent forestry commission, with a view to the preservation of the natural beauties of Crawford, Dixville, Franconia and other mountain notches, is one which ought to succeed. The judiciary committee of the House has before it several bills relating to forest preservation, and it is not improbable that important legislation may be the outcome. To strip the mountains of New Hampshire of their timber is to seriously affect the water supply on which so many manufacturing industries depend and to destroy the attractiveness of New Hampshire scenery for summer tourists.—Boston Traveller.

Mr. Sloane Objected.

The venerable and dignified Samuel Sloane, of the Delaware, Lackawana & Western Railroad, was recently called up by an imperative ring on his telephone, addressed by a reporter at the other end of the line as "Sammy" and requested to give up what information he had about a certain foot-ball game. Mr. Sloane remarked that his name wasn't "Sammy" and he had no information about a foot-ball game or a dog fight either, and would the other fellow kindly take himself away. A few words of explanation sufficed to show that the reported was after a sporting man of the same name and had called up the wrong number.—New York World.

Rapid Transit in the South.

Rapid transit in the South is humorous all the time. Time being of no earthly importance in this latitude the joke is always cheap and agreeable. Yesterday, having no thought of anything beyond a ride in the sunshine, I boarded one of the open cars which are now running through the town. At the next corner the car stopped and remained at a standstill long enough for the little mules to go to sleep. I was sitting just behind the driver, and thinking perhaps that some rule of the road entailed a long wait at this point, which was outside the town proper, I asked him if he intended to start again soon.

"Wal, I dunno, suh," he replied politely. "You see, that old lady wants to get on this heah kyar—but I can't tell how long it'll take her to get heah," and he pointed up a road at right angles to the track leading to three or four cottages perched on a hill a quarter of a mile away. Half way between us and the cottages an old lady was walking toward us. She did not seem to be in a hurry; neither did she wave her hands frantically or scream as a Northern woman would have done under similar circumstances. She took her time and the driver of the street-car recognized her sacred right to go slow. When she had taken her seat he unwound the brake in a leisurely way, woke the mules, and went on.

Still further south at Dallas, Tex., the other day, some friends of mine were riding on a street-car when a lady in the party saw some popcorn on the sidewalk.

"O! what lovely popcorn," she said, "I wish I had some!"

"I suppose you'd like me to stop the car and get some for you," was her husband's ironical remark.

The driver of the car overheard it and stopped the car at once and said he'd wait while the popcorn was bought for the lady.—Hot Springs Letter.

MISS-FORTUNES come to some men when they get married, and they don't mind it a bit.

Cats as Clocks.

Everyone knows that cats can see in the dark, but the reason they can do so is because of the peculiar construction of their eyes. You may have noticed that in a moderate light the pupil or black part in pussy's eyes is small and oval shaped, while in the full glare of light it becomes narrow. Now, in the dark, it expands to a circle, and nearly fills the surface of the eyeball.

This peculiarity of the cat's eye is turned to account in a curious manner by the Chinese. The Abbe Huc relates that when he was travelling in China he asked his attendant what time it was. The man went over to a cat that was quietly basking in the sun, and, examining its eyes, told the Abbe that it was about two hours afternoon, and on being questioned how he knew that, he explained that the pupils of a cat's eye were largest in the morning, and that they gradually grew smaller as the light increased, till they reached their minimum at noon; that then they began to widen again, till at night they once more became large.

The good Abbe was filled with admiration for the ingenuity of a people who could use cats as clocks. But it must be admitted that this way of telling the time of day is rather a loose one, and could only be trusted in very clear and serene weather, for temporary gloom or the darkness of a storm would sadly derange your four-footed clock and put it all wrong.

Men Behind Dress-goods Counters.

If you have done much shopping you must have noticed that more men than women are employed at the dress goods counters, observes a Chicago Tribune shopper. It occurred to the writer to ask if there was any reason for this. The manager replied, just as if he had been expecting some one to ask the question. "There are several reasons for it. Women do not like to take the say-so of their own sex on dress goods men have better ideas of combination than women; men are more diplomatic in dealing with woman than saleswomen are. A saleswoman can accomplish more at some other counters than men. But at the dress-goods counter men make best employes. You would naturally think that a woman could grab up a piece of goods and show it to advantage. I never saw one that could do it. Few women are good judges of combinations of colors on the counter. A modiste is, of course, but a woman cannot always have a modiste with her when she goes shopping. Men who are in this business take to a thing like combining colors as naturally as ducks take to water. They seem to know as soon as they see a woman what will become her in the way of dress goods. There are many articles in such a store as this which women prefer to buy of their own sex, but when it comes to dress goods they perfer to deal with men."

Prompt Ruling.

It is chiefly in civil courts that complaint is made of the law's delay." Courts martial are only temporary organizations, and cannot continue cases from term to term. But with all the promptness of military legal procedure, it is not often that a decision is obtained with so little hesitation as in the following case.

An old lady living in "Dixie" in the time of the Rebellion brought her complaints to the headquarters of the Confederate General Bragg, where she was met by his adjutant, and the following conversation ensued.

Old Lady— Is this where Captain Bragg lives?

Colonel Brent—Yes, madam; can I do anything for you?

Old Lady—Well, you see, mister, I live over where the fightin' was, and when Captian Bragg's company skeered the Yankees, they ran rite peerst my house—rite peerest—when up comes Captain Forrest with his crittur company [cavalry] and makes a line of fight rite through my yard, and oversets my ash-hopper, and treads—

General Bragg (sitting near)—Colonel Brent see that the lady's claim is settled immediately.

The Danger of Wearing Red Stockings.

It has been remarked that the wearing by children of red stockings coincides with pustular eruptions on their legs and feet. The Board of Health in Paris employed M. Schutzenberger, a chemical expert, to ascertain whether the dyes coloring the stockings contained poisonous matter. He has sent in his report, in which he says that all the many specimens submitted to him derived their red color from aniline and containing a large proportion of antimoniac oxide. As children perspire freely, this matter enters into solution and is thus taken into the pores. The professor had no doubt that it was the cause of the pustural rash which accompanies the use of red stockings. The Board of Health has reported in favor of the interdiction for wearing apparel of dyes obtained from metallic preparations.

In selecting breedeng birds, pick out the best and discard all of the weak, sickly ones. Generally it is best to use fowls for breeding that are at least one year old. If pullets are desired, have old hens and young cockerels; if roosters are desired reverse this. So far no rule has been discovered for determining the sex of eggs; it is all guess work. Save all the poultry manure to use in the garden in the spring.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1891.—The count of Uncle Sam's ducats made necessary by the recent change in the office of the United States treasurer, and which has been in progress for several weeks, is now nearly finished. It has taken some time, because it is no small job to reckon over four thousand and five hundred tons of coins, and this, apart from three hundred millions or so in bank or treasury notes. For nearly two weeks a number of clerks have been engaged in clinking the gold and silver which fill the huge boxes, tolling over the shining pieces, weighing them out and sealing them up in bags. One gets a notion of the magnitude of the task when it is considered that one of the vaults beneath the ground floor of the treasury building containing 85,000,000 silver dollars is 100 feet long, 60 feet wide and 15 feet high, chocked full of coined precious metal. There is another vault which contains $65,000,000 in silver and $25,000,000 in gold. In counting the masses of silver and gold, each bag containing $1,000 is removed to the vault and first examined to see if the seal is intect. If so, it is placed upon scales and weighed. On one side of the balance is put one thousand unused dollars, and the sack must be found an even counterpoise. It it is light it is opened and the money in it is reckoned, piece by piece. Coin suffers more or less loss by abrasion, even when not in circulation, and it might be that a bag would be less heavy on this account, though having in it the $1,000. Also when a seal has been broken the contents of the bag is poured out, counted and put back in again. The sacks that are opened are resealed, but, ordinarily, the seals are found all right and the weight is correct, in which case the bags are computed as representing so many thousands and no further trouble is taken with them before putting them back into the vaults. When the gold is gone over a particularly rigid inspection is exercised by the overseeing officials because the value is so much greater. It is a very interesting sight to watch the millions in paper money, bank notes, treasury notes, gold and silver certificates being conuted by deftly fingered young women in a big room beneath the treasurer's office. Every dollar has to be numbered before the new guardian of the national cash box gives his receipt in full to the outgoing incumbent. The stuff is all kept, except such small quantities as is needed to transact business with, in the shape of packages, each about one foot cube, which are stored away on shelves in vaults. Cash in the shape of gold or silver takes up a good deal of room, but in bills enormous sums require very little space to hold them. One of the vaults, which is nothing more than a big safe, alone contains $150,000,000. Each package holds $4,000,000 notes, red figures designating the amount enclosed. The parcels are always brought in on the elevator from up stairs and wheeled into the room where the counting is done. They are fetched by the Assistant Cashier in person, and the committee in charge of the reckoning receipts for every bundle. Each parcel is opened in its turn and the contents handed over to one of the skilled young women, who is responsible for it and signs a guarantee of its correctness before it leaves her hands. When the bundle has thus been found correct the notes are put under a hand press for a moment, then a new wrapper of brown paper is put around them and a seal with red wax completes the operation, at the conclusion of which a memorandum is made of the amount the package contains, and it is then ready to be sent back to the vault with its fellows. At the close of the last count the amount was found to be $19 short, but it was subsequently swept out of the corners of one of the vaults in the shape of some stray silver coins. It is said that no deficiency of this sort has ever occurred, save once, when the specie turned over to a new treasurer proved to be just three cents short, and Gen. Spinner, the outgoing official was obliged to make up the amount out of his own pocket. If it should ever happen that an unexpected hole in the assets was made by an embezzlement, or otherwise, the treasurer would be responsible, but congress would, undoubtedly, make it up to him by a special appropriation. It is hardly likely, however, that such a thing can occur as things are so arranged at the treasury that not even the treasurer himself can possibly steal a dollar, nor any one, unless a conspiracy was organized. If any one succeeded in breaking in from the outside he could not very well get away with more than 200 pounds of gold, which only represents $50,000.

Clippings.

From The Thief River Falls Press.

J. P. Harren and Joseph Bishop of Red Lake Falls were with us on Saturday and Sunday last. Mr. Harren played the base violin for the dance and Joseph enjoyed himself generally.

The steam boat being built by the Meehan Bros. on the bank of the Red Lake River twenty-five miles above here, is fast approaching completion and will soon be employed in toeing logs from the upper Red Lake to Thief River Falls.

Tis The Same the World Over.

From the St. Hilare Spectator.

S. M. Dainard has traded his alto horn to J. M. Hanson for a fiddle and the neighbors in Hanson's locality are not pleased with the trade. Hanson's lung capacity seems ample and says he'll learn to play on that horn if he clears the town of people. In the mean time Dainard's neighbors on the Water street are jubilant as Sam hasn't begun yet to play on his fiddle.

It Is Indispensable.

In olden times newspapers were considered valuable to readers only for their news, and advertisments were mere incidental surplusage, inserted by merchants as a sort of charity to help fill up the paper, and rarely attracted attention. To-day the newspaper is indispensable, not only to the merchants but to the shoppers of the family as the universally acceptep medium of attracting business. Advertisments are no longer the regulation musty affairs they used to be. They are among the most artistic and attractive features of the popular newspaper, and the frugal housewife scans the fresh business announcements of each day or week as carefully as the dealer or speculator scans the produce or money market. Those business houses who patronize the newspapers are the ones who secure the bulk of trade. The carefully edited, compact fresh, complete, cheap and neatly printed newspaper is the popular favorite, and the only channel through which the public can be reached, either for business or sentiment.

Two Beautiful Young Girls.

Newport is to have a sensation this summer. It is authentically stated that the beautiful and celebrated daughters of Lord Duff rin, Beatrice and Ade[illegible], [illegible] to grace this famous resort with their presence this coming season.

It will be remembered that Beatrice's beautiful dark eyes have played havoc lately with the heart of Albert, the eldest son of thePrince of Wales. What it will amount to is as yet a matter of conjecture in England. The young ladies are acknowledged to be the most beatiful in all Europe, and there will be not a little excitement in the hearts of our American belles over their coming. They are exquisitely dressed, and their costumes will be marvels of curiosity. Unlike most ladies, they know exactly what is suited to them. Some time ago they sent for chief designer of the Paris house of The New York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazar, and selected forty costumes each, the cost of which will amount to thousands of pounds.

Through the courtesy of these young ladies we have been permitted to copy for The new York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazar two of their most exquisite costumes, which appear as figures 3 and 4 on the colored plates of the June number of this magazine, just out and for which the publisher has issued, in the name of the American ladies a card of thanks. It is rumored that the prince may follow the young ladies to Newport this summer. The New York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazar has the exclusive right to publish each month at least one or more of the costumes in which the ladies Beatrice and Adelaide will appear.

Relief From Rheumatism.

"This information," said a well-known physician to me, "may save many lives; at any rate, it will prove an invaluable boon to people suffering from rheumatism in any shape or form. Rheumatism, as probably everybody knows, is caused by the acidity of the blood. It should never be neglected. This remedy, as I know by long practice, is very efficacious, and it is as simple as it is powerful.

"Here it is," he added. "When a rheumatic twinge is experienced he should proceed to a druggist and buy 15 or 25 cents' worth of oil of gaulteria (oil of wintergreen), put ten drops on a lump of sugar, place it in the mouth, permit it to dissolve slowly, and swallow it. This should be repeated at intervals of two hours until the last vestige of the malady has disappeared. In the meantime take a dose or two of Rochells salts.

"That," said the physican, "is all there is to it, but if taken as I have prescribed it will save suffering humanity many dollars in doctors' bills, to say nothing of pains, aches, and swellings. No. I charge nothing for this advice. It is simply given for the benefit of mankind."—New York Herald.

Decoration Day.

"Memorial Day," we believe, is the exact term in the statute making May 30 a national holiday, but it was "Decoration Day" by spontaneous movement of the people long before the law-makers concluded to legalize its observance. Did you ever think, as you see the comrades of the G. A. R. going in procession to strew flowers on the grass of their deceased brothers, that the number of this procession will dwindle year by year, till soon only a tottering old man will be left? Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Hancock, Logan, Porter—all gone. Soon nothing will be left but to visit the battlefields of the South, and if the present rate of progress continues, all trace of these will be lost. This is a pleasant trip to make, and for all inhabitants of Minnesota, Dakotas, and the upper Mississippi valley, "The Burlington" with its own lines to Chicag and St. Louis, is the favorite route. For tickets, etc., apply to any agent of this or connecting lines, or write to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass Agent C. B. & N. R. R., St. Paul Minn.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

WHAT FREE HIDES HAVE ACCOMPLISHED.

Large Increase in Exports of Leather and Boots and Shoes—English Buyers in the American Market—A Strong Case for Free Raw Materials.

The wisdom of the policy of free raw materials is well illustrated in the case of leather. Hides were put on the free list nearly twenty years ago, and our exports of leather and leather goods have steadily increased ever since then, reaching during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, the total of $12,438,000. These exports will be still larger during the fiscal year now drawing to a close.

On the subject of our foreign market for leather, the Boston Boot and Shoe Recorder says:

"Foreigners have become steady purchasers of shoe-making material from America. The future growth of the traffic is certain to be continuous and rapid. There are those in the leather trade who feel that in another ten years the volume of foreign transactions in leather will be double what it is now. They assume, of course, that there will be no absurd legislation to interfere with the business. The proposition a year or so ago to tax hides startled the trade somewhat at the time, but that has gone by and we cannot expect any interference in that quarter for several years to come. We shall expect the same steady increase in years to come that has been going on for the past six or eight years."

"English buyers of leather," the same journal goes on, "are now considered to be one of the regular factors of our market, and hardly a day passes that transactions in leather by these people are not recorded. The English leather commission merchant continues to solicit consignments of American leather, and considerable American leather is now going into this channel."

The foreign demand for leather is so strong and steady that it is looked to to raise prices. As the Recorder says: "The fact that larger quantities than usual of shoe materials are going out of the country will inevitably strengthen the determination of holders of leather to adhere to their price, and to advance if they can."

Under the influence of cheap leather our boot and shoe industry has developed, and machinery and methods have been invented which place us far ahead of Europe in capacity for rapid work. Our shoe-making machinery is even now being introduced into Europe. Mr. John T. Day, editor of the London Shoe and Leather Record, has recently been visiting this country. In speaking of his visit, the Boston Boot and Shoe Recorder says: "During his visit to America he has been investigating the methods of boot and shoe manufacturers in this country, and as a result will take home a mass of interesting information relative to it. In comparing English and American styles of work, editor Day states unhesitatingly that we are far ahead of our British cousins in the use of modern machinery and in the manner of doing the work."

Such have been the beneficent results of free trade. But these results have not been reaped by foreigners alone, but in a much larger measure by our own people. Never were our shoes so well made and cheaply sold as to-day. The pasteboard soles and heels, so common just after the war, have entirely disappeared, free raw material enabling our manufacturers to turn out cheaply shoes made entirely of leather.

With the increased exports of leather there has been also a very great increase in the imports of raw hides. These imports last year reached nearly $22,000,000.

It has certainly been of no disadvantage to our farmers that this large quantity of hides came into the country free. No one grows cattle for hides; and the value of the hide, is so small in comparison with the meat that it scarcely enters into calculation.

If free hides have proven of so great benefit to the leather industry, giving it a large and stable foreign market, why would not equal benefits follow free wool?

American Horses in Europe.

McKinley pretended to see that our farmers were in danger of being flooded with too many cheap horses coming into the country from Canada. Of course, the farmers are themselves the principal buyers of horses, but McKinley depended upon them to overlook that fact, and to be overwhelmed with gratitude to him to find in the "farmers' tariff" that he raised the duty on horses.

Under the old law, horses came in at 20 per cent. ad valorem. McKinley raised this duty to 30 per cent. on all horses valued at more than $150 per head, and to $30 apiece on horses worth less than $150.

These duties look like a sign of distress, like a confession that there is some ruinous outside competition. The following item from the Rural New-Yorker, however, shows that the American horse can hold up his head among the pauper horses of Europe:

"Shipping horses to Scotland from Philadelphia is becoming quite a business, 400 having been sent within the last few months. They all go to Aberdeen, where a dealer has opened large stables for the sale of American horses exclusively. The trade is expected to increase rapidly. The trotting horse is preferred, being used as a coach horse and roadster. It cost $30 for the transportation of each horse, besides $40 insurançe on each animal valued at $200. But notwithstanding these heavy charges, which do not include the expenses to Aberdeen from Glasgow, the shippers realize a profit, and propose to push the trade."

McKinley's horse duty, then, was only intended to fool farmers who lack horse sense.

Hay Prices and a Hay Trust.

When the McKinleyites doubled the duty on hay last year many farmers doubtless thought that higher prices for hay would now be in order. It has not worked any disadvantage yet to the farmers of New York State. A correspondent of the Rural New-Yorker tells why: "The price has for several years ranged from $10 to $13 per ton to the grower, the buyer furnishing a press and the men to operate it, and the farmer furnishing the additional help and board for all hands, horse-feed and coal, and he has also had to deliver the bales to the cars. All this was quite satisfactory until last fall, when the three hundred hay dealers in this State formed a "trust," fixing the price at $7, and charging $1.75 per ton for baling, in case the dealer baled the hay and did not buy it. Nor was this all; an ironclad contract was produced for the farmer to sign, which gave the buyer the privilege of grading the hay at the car, and many received only $5 or $6 for hay for which they expected $7. There was no use in talking back after they had signed the contract, for the monopolists could pay what they saw fit and the growers were obliged to take it.

"All this naturally caused a vigorous kick, and now presses were bought by enterprising men. Most of the latter were approached by the trust men, who tried to induce them by various means not to press for farmers. The presses, however, have been constantly running, and some of the farmers have shipped their hay, while others have sold theirs where they saw fit. The hay dealers, however, had too good a thing, and stuck well to their trust, and go where one might, $7 was all they would offer, and they got plenty at that price, and, strange as it may seem, some old and very prosperous farmers have sold recently at that figure."

Protecting American Labor.

When the protected coal and coke operators of Pennsylvania had their great difficulty over wages some years ago, they got rid of their American labor and imported Hungarians and Italians by contract to take its place. This was the occasion for passing the national contract labor law, which forbids the employment of laborers in foreign countries and bringing them here under contract. The law was really a scheme to prevent protected American mine-owners from degrading American labor. The law was passed at the instance of Pennsylvania labor organizations, which were suffering from the competition of imported contract labor. These organizations had heard the usual amount of rot about protection of American labor; but they saw that a protective tariff law alone did not secure any benefit to labor. There must be a separate law to prevent the protected mine-owners from making contracts in Europe with "pauper labor," to come here and take the place of native Americans, who should organize and attempt to enforce their demands for living wages.

But the mischief had already been done. The Pennsylvania mine-owners had already brought in large numbers of Hungarians and Italians; others followed rapidly, and for some years now the Pennsylvania mines have been worked almost entirely by hordes of ignorant foreigners, the cheapest and most degraded labor in the United States. This labor, however, learned to writhe under its degradation. The worm trodden upon will turn. The imported labor learned to organize itself and move in a body for higher wages and a better standard of living.

When, therefore, the mine owners several months ago resolved to reduce wages, they were met by a demand from their imported Hungarians and Italians for an increase instead of a reduction. Then followed the great coal and coke strike with some 30,000 laborers out of work. Bloody riots followed and the troops had to be called out to keep the peace.

Meanwhile, the strike had caused immense losses to both sides. At the end of the twelfth week, the estimated loss was $3,500,000, of which sum $1,000,000 represented loss of wages to the men, and the remainder losses of the manufacturers—an average loss to all parties of about $300,000 per week.

The latest news is to the effect that a new supply of Italians, "most of them fresh from Europe," is being shipped into the coke region, "under a strong guard." It was stated by the Italian leader of this band that there are American agents all over Italy trying to induce Italians to come to the United States. Several thousands of the poorest class have thus found their way to Pittsburg since the strike began, and, it is added, "just who pays their fares does not appear on the surface."

Such is the fate of American labor under protection. And the organs and the talkers go on reiterating their stale and exploded assertions about protection raising wages.

Sugar Trust Pranks.

How is this? American granulated sugar is now selling at 3.75 cents per pound, wholesale, in London, while the wholesale price in New York is 4.12½ to 4.25 cents. Last year the sugar trust was moving heaven and earth to get a higher duty than a half-cent per pound on refined sugar, but the duty was fixed at that figure, notwithstanding that the efforts of the trust were powerfully backed up by Quay and Blocks-of-Five Dudley.

But does the trust seem to be hurt? Not a bit. It bobs up serenely, and goes to selling sugar under the noses of its foreign rivals a half-cent a pound cheaper than in the home market. What is the sense in continuing any protection at all to this trust?

Another prank of the trust has been talked of in the trade papers recently. In order to keep up its prices in the home market and keep out foreign sugar the trust has had in view a plan to make a discount of one-fourth of a cent per pound to all the large wholesale dealers who will bind themselves not to handle any imported refined sugar. In this way prices will be kept up to the domestic consumer, while the trust will unload its surplus on the foreign market at a reduced price, and will go on declaring big dividends upon its watered stock.

McKinley Tin Cans.

Certain protectionist organs have been printing the absured statement that tin cans are cheaper now than a year ago, before the prices of tin plate had been affected by the tariff. A statement of that character will do for use in McKinley organs; but men in the packing business know that cans are dearer than they were. At the National Association of Canned Goods Packers, in Chicago, T. L. Bunting, a well known packer of Hamburg, N. Y., said that duty had advanced the cost of 2-lb. cans 8⅓ cents per dozen, 3-lb. cans 10⅓ cents per dozen, and gallon cans 12 cents per dozen.

He further stated that if no duty were imposed the packer could afford to pay the farmer 25 per cent. more for produce than he pays now, and could still sell the goods at the same price. McKinley's tin-plate tax is therefore especially burdensome to all farmers who raise fruits or vegetables for the canneries.

The Foreign Market.

The McKinleyites take every occasion to belittle the foreign market, but all the same the foreign market goes on proving its value to our farmers. Our total exports of beef, hog, and dairy products during April reached a value of $9,536,059, against exports in April, 1890, of $9,379,706. The totals for the four months ending April 30 have increased from $42,148,694 for 1890 to $44,346,900 for 1891. The exports of breadstuffs during April were valued at $12,373,837, against $15,543,912 in same month last year. For the ten months ending April 30 the breadstuffs exported were valued at $97,026,753, against $126,170,289 the same time in 1890.

Poor crops at home last year left a smaller surplus of breadstuffs for export than usual; but the foreign demand is now raising prices in the home market.

The Cobden Club Dying.

If reports from London are true the McKinleyites are about to lose their favorite campaign cry. The Cobden Club is on its last legs. The London correspondent of the New York Times says that the famous club "is so hard up for funds that it is obliged again to omit its annual fish dinner at Greenwich," and that "it is not unlikely that it will expire altogether within the next few years."

"The truth is," the correspondent goes on, "that the club's mission seems to have ended. It was founded in the first flush of the triumph of political economy over stupidity and ignorance in England by men who fondly believed the rest of the world was open to conviction by argument, as the English had shown themselves to be. They were going so to spread the light that soon all mankind would abandon those twin mediæval relics of barbarism, tariffs and wars. The dream was lofty, but it cruelly failed of realization. * * * The old generation of Englishmen who founded the club have mostly died off. The new generation do not burn with sacred enthusiasm to proselytize the world. They see that England is making profits right and left by the protectionist follies of her neighbors, and they are indisposed to spend money in dissipating those follies. Hence the Cobden Club may be described as on its last legs."

Not enough Cobden Club gold to buy a fish dinner? What in the world will the McKinleyites do when they can no longer frighten the ignorant by shouting "Cobden Club"? They will be of all men most miserable, and no balm in Gilead can heal their hurt.

Does It Keep Wages High?

Protectionists coolly claim that protection not only raises but that it makes wages continue to go higher and higher. The tendency upward, they say, is permanent. If these advocates of protection will refer to the report of Carroll D. Wright, which he issued in 1883 as Labor Commissioner for the State of Massachusetts, they will find some figures not much calculated to strengthen their case. Here are the wages in some of the protected industries of Massachusetts in 1860 and 1880:

	Average Weekly Wages.
Boots and shoes	$11.42	$9.60
Carpets	6.62	5.87
Clothing	8.26	8.81
Cottons	6.50	7.37
Furniture	11.77	9.95
Leather	10.01	9.63
Linen and jute	4.68	4.82
Paper	8.63	8.17
Silk	5.91	5.87
Worsteds	6.10	5.66
Average in all industries	$8.00	$7.52

When protectionists are putting forth their extravagant assertions about what protection has done for labor they ought to have the decency to add, "Except in Massachusetts."

They have been figuring on the thing in Massachusetts with the above result. The State printer has put the figures into type, and everybody can read it. No wonder that the old superstition that protection raises wages is dying out among the workpeople of Masachusetts.

Exporting Paper.

A trade paper announces that the Hudson River Paper and Pulp Company, at Corinth, N. Y., have an order from Melbourne, Australia, for 4,000 tons of printing paper, and are now shipping 100 tons per month. They are also sending large quantities of paper to New Zealand.

Last year we exported paper and manufactures of paper to the value of about $1,200,000, and the figures for this year will be somewhat greater. Notwithstanding the ability of our paper manufacturers to compete in the world's markets, McKinley did not lower the paper duties at a single point. The old duties on common printing paper, sized or unsized, were retained, but on all tissue and copying papers the duties were raised enormously. The old duties were 20 and 25 per cent.; the McKinley duties are 8 cents a pound and 15 per cent., equal to a single ad valorem duty of 90 per cent. Photographers' paper was raised from 25 per cent. to 35, and envelopes from 25 to 30.

Our paper makers are able to hold their own in unprotected markets; where is the need for more protection in the home market? The McKinleyites have an itching to raise duties and can never be satisfied till they are thus occupied.

The Tariff the Issue.

Senator Carlisle has recently been in New York. Asked while there whether the tariff would be the leading issue in 1892, he answered:

"I think so. It ought to be, and I sincerely hope that it will be. I think the Democratic party would make a serious mistake if it allowed the tariff question to be made second to the silver question or any other. It is the real issue. The party is a unit on that question, while on the silver question it is divided. That alone is one reason why the fight should be made with that for the main issue. I hope the silver question will be laid aside or made secondary, leaving the tariff as the dominant issue."

THE protectionists are forever referring to the nail industry as one of the special cases proving the wisdom of the protective policy. It seems, however, that this child of the protective system does not insure to its laborers all the comfort and happiness which are said to be the certain result of encouraging domestic industry. At any rate a protectionist trade paper prints the following item: "A reduction of 16 per cent. in wages, to go into effect May 15, has been ordered by the Brook Nail Factory Company, of Reading, Pa."

THE great State of Pennsylvania is reported to have raised 37,000,000 pounds of tobacco last year, and hasn't a cigarette factory within her borders. We see no necessary connection between the two things here stated, but if Illinois, with her immense cabbage fields, should be reported without a cigarette factory, we could at once see something wrong, a palpable neglect of industrial possibilities.

MILLIONS of small, red transparent things, about the size of a pea, having long feelers and numerous legs, are found to inhabit the waters about 41 degrees south latitude and 49 degrees west longitude.

Some Facts About "Relics."

Charles Howard was talking to Burke, the old book store man a few evenings ago, when a stranger fresh from New Orleans slipped up, saying to Mr. Burke:

"What will you give for a big lock of Jefferson Davis' hair?"

"Ah! I have plenty of it," answered Mr. Burke. Quite a quantity."

Then as the stranger walked away surprised that any one should have the treasure he thought so valuable, Mr. Burke said:

"The truth is I have everything a relic hunter wants. I have hair from the head of many distinguished men dead or alive. Maybe you wouldn't believe it, but one-quarter the money I put into my house came from the sale off hair of George Washington,s head."

"Do you know," Mr. Burke went on, "that the relic hunter is the biggest fool on earth. Any relic he may want has no value. It is simply a question of how much he is able to pay. I can always size a man up as he comes in and am therefore able to hit him just right.

"Take a battlefield relic," said Mr. Burke after a pause. "I go home, say, and get my wife to mark a half a dozen pieces of ribbon as I want it. Then I pound two bullets together and fasten to the ribbon. They are bullets, you know, which met in mid air on the Kenesaw field. I put one in the showcase with the card and the others in a drawer. A relic hunter buys the only one, but as soon as he is gone the drawer is opened and another takes its place. They cost me about a dime and bring in a five."—Atlanta Constitution.

The Gift of Gab.

George Stephenson was a strong and original thinker on many scientific subjects, but he had not always sufficient fluency of speech to defend his views. One evening he held an animated discussion with an acquaintance, Dr. Buckland, on the theory of the formation of coal, and as Buckland excelled him in tongue fence, Stephenson was completely silenced. Next morning he was walking thoughtfully through his grounds when Sir William Follet came up and asked what he was pondering. "Why, Sir William," said he, "I am thinking over that argument I had with Buckland last night. I know I am right, and that if I had only command of words I should have beaten him." "Let me know all about it," said Sir William, "and I'll see what I can do for you."

The too sat down in an arbor, and the astute lawyer entered with zeal into the points of the case. When he had completely mastered the subject, he said: "Now I'm ready for him." After dinner Sir Robert Peel, who had been acquainted with the plot, adroitly introduced the subject of controversy. and the result was that in the argument which followed the man of science was overcome by the man of law. "And what do you say, Mr. Stephenson?" asked Sir Robert, laughing. "Why," he replied, "I say this: that of all the powers above and under the earth, there seems to me to be no power so great as the gift of gab."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Curious Relic of a Cyclone,

E. S. Wilson, a blacksmith of Ozark' Mo., has a relic of the Marshfield cyclone which occurred April 18, 1880, that is a remarkable curosity. This witnesses one of the freaks of the great storm is a black quart bottle, bent by some mysterious force into an elliptic circle without a crack or break in the glass that the closest scrutiny can descover. The neck of the bottle actually touches the edge of the bottom, and the fact that the glass was not broken in any way by the force of the storm is shown by its holding water or any other fluid. By gradually turning the bottle as the water is poured in it can be nearly filled to its full capacity, so as to show the perfect soundness of the material. This bottle was found by Mr. Wilson the day after the Marshfield disaster, and examined by Prof. Tice. The meteorologist attributed the bending of the bottle to the force of the electricity, and considered this one of the most wonderful results of the agency at work in the storm cloud. The bottle was found in the wreck of one of the Marshfield drug stores.

A Thing of the Past.

Mrs. Frank Leslie wrote something the other day in which she advised a man who couldn't afford to wear a clean collar every day to wear celluloid. She could have written nothing more absurb, Celluloid collars and cuffs have practically been off the market for years, and a St. Louis admirer of Mrs. Leslie who wanted to take her advice would have a long tramp round among the stores before he got what he wanted. A man wearing celluloid collars and cuffs on the street would be a marked economist. The stuff became unpopular for a, very good reason. It was uncleanly, didn't look well after a day or two's wear, and a man who kept himself neat with celluloid found that it cost him just as much as linen and a laundry. The best linen collars and cuffs are very cheap now, much cheaper than they were when celluloid was first nsed, and a man couldn't save a cent by wearing celluloid now.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Wine-Drinking Baby Capri.

When wandering one evening toward the Villa di Tiberio, I stumbled on a curious scene. A mother sat on a wall by the roadside with her infant in her arms, while the father, a strapping young farmer, poured wine from a black bottle down the eager throat of the baby. My remonstrances were met by a smile at my ignoracne and the assertion that there was nothnig better than wine for it. On my return I found the boy partaking of its natural food as heartily as it had done from the wine bottle, "That," I said to the mother, "is the proper drink for your child. You will lay up misery for it if you exchange it for wine." "Do you think so, Signore?" she replied, and, showing me the legs and cheeks of the fattest young rascal I ever saw, she added, "Does that look like disease? Can you find in our country a baby of six months to edual him?

On mentioning the incident to an old man at the hotel he assured me that it was quite the usual practice in Capri, and on the same evening pointing to his son a handsome young fellow who was dancing the tarantella, he said, "Had that lad not got wine from the time he was four months old he would not have been, here to-night. It saved his life. Good Words.

To Prevent Rusting.

Professor Smithelis, in speaking before the Leeds, England, association of engineers, endeavored to answer the question: "How can the action of rusting be prevented?" He said many things have been tried. Iron might be painted, and by the adoption of certain precautions an affective method might be arrived at. One precaution was that the metal must be perfectly clean. A spot of rust embedded below a coat of paint would often break out of itself. There was the method of covering the iron with oils and tarry matters. There was also the process of galvanizing the iron; the process of enameling, which was useful for small articles, although the enamel was apt to chip off, and the Bower-Barff process, which was admirable. Alluding to boilers, he said that by putting soda into them not only was the acidity of the water corrected, but something was introduced which would absorb the carbonic-acid gas and prevent its acting in a rusty capacity.—Chicago News.

The money is yours, and the misery is yours; and until you are willing to believe, and spend the one for the relief of the other, they will stay so. John H. Foster, 1122 Brown Street, Philadelphia, says: "My wife is a little Scotch woman, thirty years of age and of a naturally delicate disposition. For five or six years past she has been suffering from Dyspepsia. She became so bad at last that she could not sit down to a meal but she had to vomit it as soon as she had eaten it. Two bottles of your August Flower have cured her, after many doctors failed. She can now eat anything, and enjoy it; and as for Dyspepsia, she does not know that she ever had it." ⊗

WHO WAS IT?

IT wasn't a bad idea of mine, takin' city boarders," said Mrs. Maydew, as she sat in front of the kitchen table counting out bills of various denominations. "Just look at that, Zuleima—what I've cleared this summer, free of all expenses!"

"But it wasn't altogether your idea, mother," said Zuleima. "It was Cousin Maria's."

"Well, p'r'aps she did suggest it," said Mrs. Maydew; "but I carried it out—and a great deal better speculation I found it than sewing on shirts or taking in shoes to bind; and I've made the Durham cow's price—and I've bought Deacon Doubleday's second-hand wagon, and a new stair carpet, and I've got $100 to put in the bank besides all that!"

Zuleima listened with a sweet abstracted smile. Durham cows—second hand wagons—bank accounts—what was that to the great happiness that had come to her through this city-boarder experiment?

"Ought I to tell mother now, or ought I to leave it to him?" she questioned herself; and while she still deliberated, Mrs. Maydew's sharp, high-pitched voice broke in upon the current of her thoughts.

"And really, now I come to think on't, I don't know but what I like young Fairgrave the best of any boarder we've had. Didn't you, Zuleima?"

"Yes," she answered, almost inaudibly; "I—I liked him very well."

"And them pictures he painted were very good," went on unconscious Mrs. Maydew, "though they wasn't as bright colored as the chromo of 'Abraham A-sacrificin' Isaac' over Miss Parker's parlor mantle, and them views of ruined castles that Ruth Chicksey bought of the peddler for $1.50 each, gilt frames and all. They were sort o' dim colored, you know, and the sun didn't seem to shine real bright in 'em. But it's strange, ain't it, about his bein' engaged?"

"Engaged!" Zuleima started and crimsoned more intensely than ever; a shy smile broke out upon her lips. Her secret, then, was out. Who could have betrayed it? Perhaps Vernon himself.

"I didn't believe a word of it at first," added Mrs. Maydew, rolling up her bills and placing them in a discolored leather pocket-book. Zuleima turned her face away, still smiling. "And she twice his age, at least!" went on Mrs. Maydew.

"She!" Who do you mean?"

"Maria, of course," said Mrs. Maydew. "I've always heard that there's no fool like an old fool, and I begin to believe it."

"Mother," cried Zuleima, "what do you mean?"

"La?" said Mrs. Maydew, "is it possible you hain't read that letter that came this mornin'? She's to be married to Fairgrave in November—the poor, silly, old goose—and she wants you to come up and help her buy her wedding clothes. I couldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it writ and signed and sealed under her own name. And she's 45 if she's a day!"

Zuleima stood bewildered and amazed. The walls seemed to be whirling around her; the ticking of the old clock grew faint in her ears. Vernon Fairgrave engaged to Miss Maria Denham after all the sweet words he had whispered in her ear, all the tender hand pressures—the unuterable looks of love that passed between them! But, after all, now that she came to look dispassionately back on the past, she could not recall that he had ever said to her in so many words: "Will you be my wife?" He had never placed a betrothal ring on her finger; he had contented himself with vague words—glances which could not absolutely be interpreted into sentences, and a horrible sensation of shame and anger seemed to fill her veins with fire instead of blood as she thought of how she had been duped.

"He has been making game of me," she thought. "He has enjoyed his summer in the wilderness, and now he is going away—to leave me without a pang of remorse! Oh, heaven! and how am I to endure it?"

"Ain't you well, Zuleima?" Mrs. Maydew asked, with rather a frightened glance at her daughter. "I knowed you hadn't ought to go out into the hot sun to pick them last lima beans to dry. Lay down, and let me get you the camphor bottle to smell."

But Zuleima recovered herself with an effort.

"I'm well enough," said she. "Where is Maria's last letter, mother? I want to read it. Well I never should have suspected Mr. Fairgrave of being a fortune-hunter."

"It's a great thing to have a little money," shrewdly remarked Mrs. Maydew. "Though Maria ain't bad-lookin', neither, for a woman of her years; not sence she got them new false teeth o' hern."

For Miss Maria Denham the one well-to-do member of the family, owing to a lucky speculation in coal-mine shares on the part of the late Dr. Denham, whose only descendant she was—a plump, high-complexioned old maid with sparkling black eyes like jet beads, and a loud, cheery voice.

It was nearly noon the next day when Vernon Fairgrave strolled up to the house. Mrs. Maydew greeted him with a broad smile.

"Zuleima? She ain't at home," said she. "She is gone to the city, to Maria's, to buy weddin-clothes. Aha! you see I know your secret."

"She has told you, then?"

Of course she's told me!" said Mrs. Maydew, shaking the young artist's hand as if it were a pump-handle. And I wish you all happiness, I'm sure. She's a good girl, if she a'int exactly a beauty, and——"

"But I think she is a beauty, Mrs. Maydrew."

"Tastes differ," said the matron, with a shrug of the shoulders. "And I don't doubt she'll make you a good wife. 'Handsome is as handsome does," that's my motto. Eh? Going to the city? Well, give her my love."

Meanwhile, Zuleima, seated among the splendors of her cousin's trousseau was looking with unseeing eyes at satins, silks, tulles, gloves, and bonnets, while Maria Denham in a loud voice recounted the various stages of the prospective bridal trip.

"We're going to Niagara," said she, "though I'm sure I don't know why, I never did take stock in waterfalls; and then down the St. Lawrence, past the Thousand islands—I wonder if anybody ever counted 'em. I shan't, I know—to Montreal. Eh, Zuleima? I took you by surprise, did I?"

"Rather," Zuleima answered, huskily.

"You thought I was a foregone conclusion—a desperate old maid," cried the bride-elect with a peal of laughter. "Well, you see I wasn't. Never mind, Zuleima, Mr. Fairgrave says——"

"And are you really to have a pink satin ball-dress?" interrupted Zuleima, starting nervously at the sound of the name which had once been the sweetest music in her ears. "Why didn't you have heliotrope color instead?"

"He likes pink," said Maria, placidly. "It's his favorite color. And I should look like a fright in heliotrope! But really, Zuleima, haven't you suspected anything all along?"

"No."

"Then you must have been stone blind," complacently observed the bride, holding up the plump engagement finger, on which sparkled a pure white diamond. "And I've worn this all along."

Zuleima tried to smile, but her heart was as ice within her. More and more she felt convinced that it was of no use trying to face things out. She could not stand calmly by and see another woman's palace of happiness rising up on the ashes of her own dead hopes. The "pride," the "spirit" on which she had relied were but broken reeds to lean upon. She would have given worlds, had they been hers, for a chance to hide herself away and weep out the anguish of her poor bleeding heart in solitude.

"I have been a fool," she told herself, "and all to win the chance of confronting him with his falsehood and baseness? Why did I not remain at home?"

Just then a servant brought in a card. Miss Denham pounced eagerly upon it.

"It's him!" said she, joyously.

Zuleima recoiled as if an arrow had struck her.

"Your—your lover?" she gasped.

"Just that," nodded Maria, with an excellent view of the new false teeth. "Here, child, where are you going to? That door leads into the umbrella closet! What are you running away for, anyhow? Why shouldn't you stop and speak to your new cousin, eh?"

In her perturbation poor Zuleima had seized hold of the wrong door-handle, and ere she could recover herself the opposite portals were thrown wide open, and in walked a stout gentleman, with a clean shaven face and a shining bald head, carrying in one hand a gold-handled cane, and in the other a bouquet the size of a small haystack.

"My angel!" he said, dramatically.

Miss Maria jumped up and accorded him a hearty kiss.

"I'm so glad you happened to come in just now," said she. "Here's my cousin, Zuleima, Maydew. Zuleima, this is Mr. Fairgrave."

"Mr.—Fairgrave!"

Maria burst out laughing once more.

"Well, I don't wonder you're amazed," said she. "Come to remember, you haven't any of you seen Nicholas before, and I'd forgotten to tell you how stout he was. Ain't much like his nephew, eh? Nicholas this is the young lady whose folks Vernon boarded with this summer; I've told you about 'em often."

"Happy to meet her, I'm sure," said Mr. Nicholas Fairgrave, on whose visage brooded a perpetual smile—possibly at the prospect of his matrimonial good fortune—and in the same instant Vernon Fairgrave's face was seen looking over his kinsman's broad shoulder.

"I thought I should find you here, Zulisma," he said, brightening up. "You can't think, my darling, how this secret of Uncle Nicholas' has embarrassed me these past weeks. But now you've found it out, I shall have a little peace once more."

"And upon my word," added Maria, "I don't see any reason why we shouldn't have a double wedding! Eh, Miss Rosy-face?" to Zuleima.

And in Zuleima's mingled wonder, delight, and bewilderment, she spoke no word of opposition to this new plan. Why should she, after all? Why should she postpone the dawning of her life's happiness.

But Mrs. Maydew's astonishment was beyond the power of words to describe.

"I thought of course it was Maria," said she.

"Why, didn't I tell you who it was?" rather sharply demanded Miss Denham.

"You said M. Fairgrave."

"Well, it was Mr. Fairgrave."

How was I to know there were two Mr. Fairgraves?" demanded Mrs. Maydew, in an injured voice, and Maria's answer was another of those hearty appeals of laughter that caused Mrs. Maydew to say irritably:

"I do believe she does it a-purpose to show that set o' new false teeth!" Fireside Companion.

The True Way to Bring up Boys,

Detroit Free Press.

"Yes, sir, I believe in thrashing a boy," he was saying in a loud voice to a Cass Avenue carful of passengers; "the more you thrash a boy the better it is for the boy."

"I think, sir," remarked a meek looking man next to him, "that your language is very intemperate."

"What do you object to, may I ask? Is it the word thrash? You wouldn't have me say 'beat' would you? Perhaps flog would suit you better."

"I cannot see the necessity of flogging boys, sir"

"What would you do with them, may I ask?„

"Reason with them. Talk to them in mild and encouraging tones. Remember that you were once a boy yourself."

"I do, sir; and I am thankful every day of my life for the personal chastisements my father bestowed upon me."

"Cruel, cruel, "murmured the meek man. "It is degarding to a boy to be whipped like a brute beast. No boy requires it. He can always be managed with kindness."

Every woman in the car looked curiously at the meek man, and the advocate of thrashing had a temporary chill. Then he leaned forward and inquired of the other:

"Can you manage your boys without corporeal punishment?"

"I haven't any boys," was the serene answer, and everybody laughed. It is so easy to bring up other people's children.

Forty-three Degrees Below Zero.

When a fellow is hunting around the boat for a cool place, and yearns more for the shade than he would in Southern California, when he notes grass on the hillsides nearly as high as his head, and can gather wild roses, daisies, buttercups, raspberries, white and black currants and blueberries, he thinks: How can this possibly be an Arctic land? But if he digs down anywhere for eight inches he will find the ground frozen solid with a frost that never knows a thaw.

It takes some remark like the encomium of Jack McQuesting (the old trader of Forty-Mile Creek) on the season they had last winter to remind us that we are in Arctic regions:

Last winter was the finest, and warmest season I have seen in the country; the thermometer never fell below 43 degrees below zero during the winter."

Seventy-five degrees of frost! At Nulato I looked at a well Father Ragoneaux was digging out at his mission, writes a correspondent from Alaska to the San Francisco Chronicle. It was 25 feet deep, and the frozen ground began within eight inches of the surface, and continued down, except for two layers of sand free from water, as far as the well had gone, and yet on the ground it was sultry to a man in his shirt sleeves.

A Horse With La Grippe.

From the Baltimore Sun.

A case of la grippe developed in a horse. The animal arrived from New York and was sent to Prof. Ward's infirmary in St. Paul Street. The invalid was placed in an insolated box stall, and treatment like that used on human beings similarly afflicted was begun. The symptoms of la grippe in the horse are similar to those of human beings who have it, beginning with sneezing. Then a high fever sets in which is the foerrunner of pneumonia and which sometimes ends fatally. During the epidemic of influenza which swept over Europe in 1720 and 1730 horses were attacked with a disease having all the symptoms of the human influenza. In 1872 there was a widespread outbreak among horses in the United States, followed early in 1873 by a univeral prevalence of the disease among human beings. It was called epizootic. Horses were first affected and dogs the next. While the disease in the animals was epidemic, the people who took care of the horses and were much in contact with them did not suffer more severly than those not so exposed.

Economizing the Lay-Out.

Mrs. W. was a thrifty and practical soul, and she came of a family which through all the country side was renowned for being "near." In other words, she came of a race of people who were the reverse of generous, and in herself she was, it may be added, the flower of their qualities. She had an excellent husband, but he was stricken down with typhoid pneumonia, and one morning the physician in charge announced to the weeping wife that he could live only a few hours at most. In her way Mrs. W. was fond of her husband, and she was greatly affected by the verdict which announced her approaching separation from. The scene between her and her husband was affecting in the extreme, and the nurse, who was present in the background, was moved to tears by the fervor of Mrs. W.'s grief.

"George" the weeping wife said at last, "what clothes do you want to have on when— when—"

Tears choked her utterance, and her husband feebly murmured that it did not matter to him any more how he was arrayed.

"Then you won't mind, dearest," she said between her sobs, "if we put on your old pants? The new ones haven't been worn but once, and we can send them back to the tailor, and no one will notice what sort of pants you have on in the cof—cof—coffin."

Dear George was too far gone either to care what trousers were used for the arraying of his remains for the tomb or to appreciate the perfection of his wife's economy; he simply moaned and gave up the ghost, leaving his wife free to practice any economical device that should occur to her frugal mind in the arrangements which followed in doleful sequence.

About Stanley's Hair.

The correspondent who went up country to meet Stanley describes his hair as being quite white. This he ascribes to the privations of the expedition. But those who met Mr. Stanley when he was formerly in this country will be reminded by the telegrams of an incident regarding which the great explorer was some years ago twitted by his friends. As a matter of fact, his hair had become white long ago, But Mr. Stanley did not appreciate the venerable appearance which his gray locks gave him. They became black again a good deal more suddenly than they had grown white. In view of the chance of another curious change of this kind, it is rather awkward that their present color should have been so universally made known.—London Cor. Edinburgh Scotsman.

It is a delicate proceeding to tell a woman that you do not like the music she makes, but in case of necessity the thing can be done.

A gentleman with a sensitive and cultivated ear was greatly annoyed by the persistent and wretched piano playing of a woman who occupied the room over his head. One day he met her in the hall accompanied by her three-year-old daughter.

"Your little girl plays quite well for a child of her age," he remarked in a most friendly manner. "I hear her practising every day."—Youth's Companion.

A Famous Ceylon Ruby.

Of the gems found in Ceylon the ruby is of most value, and has at times secured the highest prices. Rejecting as a traveller's tale the assertion of Marco Polo, that he saw a Ceylon ruby the size of a man's arm says the Times of India, it may be interesting to recall what is related of another Ceylon ruby, in connection with the part played unwittingly, in the rise of a family that was of note in a subsequent period in the history of the Dutch republic.

A "Chetty" physician became the owner of a large ruby, said to have been the size of a small curry-stuff grinding stone. Cutting it into pieces and retaining the larger portions, he presented the Dutch governor of Colombo, Imhoff, with eighteen buttons set with the smaller pieces. Imhoff, not unmindful of gratitude, promptly exalted the donor to the proud position of first malabar mudalayar of the gate, a title of honor still retained, and about equivalent to a lord lieutenancy of a county in England.

This rise in rank, however, stirring into restless action the dormant energies of the Chetty, the governor was at last glad to get rid of his protege by transforming him into a dignitary learned in the law, and presenting him with a seat as judge of the supreme court in Java, This gentleman was grandfather to Dr. Quint Ondaatjee, alluded to in Allison's "History of Europe" as the "great democratic leader." Whatever, however, the value attached to the Ceylon rubies in the past or the present, it should be noted that really valuable ones have ever been scarce, and they cannot vie in comparison with some Burmese specimens.

Every merchant in the country might profitably study the method of advertising followed by the "New England" of Minneapolis.

An editor is in high favor with his readers when each one finds something to please him, but let one of those readers find an item that is contrary to his preconceived notion and that editor doesn't know what he is talking about.

That young lady who almost caused the suicide of her lover was bound for Crookston, to live there. Under these circumstances the feelings of the young man were amply justified. The girl was probably insane.

With over 120 illustrations, the Cosmopolitan sets a fast pace in the handicap for magazine honors. The personal element enters largely into its composition, and an impression of beautiful women is the first received by the reader who turns its pages. The frontispiece is a portrait of Madame de Pompadour. A pleasant insight into the attractiveness of Japan women is given in a paper by Henry T. Finck,illustrated by a large number of pretty faces. S. G. W. Benjamin, ex-minister to Persia, tells the true story ot Noor Mahall, the Light of the Harem, celebrated by Thomas Moore in Lallah Rookh. Perhaps the most valuable article of the number is that contributed by Abner L. Frazer to the literature of the farmers' movement. The Cosmopolitan prize of $200 for the best article on the "needs of the farmer, his hours of labor and the national legis'ation necessary to his prosperity," was awarded by the judges to this gentleman. The Fisher Bulletin publishes the following with pica slugs between the lines. Some body has been riling the editor already?

What a wonderful being the publisher of a newspaper would be if he could publish a paper that would please every person who reads it. If we chronicle the fact that Mrs. A. visited a neighboring city, some readers will say, "There's nothing in the paper but Mrs. A. going to Grand Forks;" and if we omit such a publication, we are accused of not giving all the news. If we attend church regularly, we are accused of doing so for effect; and if we do not go to church, we are accused of being worse than a heathen. We are condemned for not enumerating a couple hundred cheap presents to the bride, when the minister gets ten dollars for simply tying the knot. If we accidentally get off a piece of witticism, we stole it from some of our exchanges. If we record the arrest of a man, who, in his drunken moments, has abused and maltreated his family, his relatives never forget us; but if we fail to note the arrest, we are accused of being afraid to put that man's name in the paper. If we humbly ask delinquent subscribers to pay up, we are told that our paper is not fit to read; and if we stop sending it,we are accused of being a brute.

Planting smiles within the wrinkles,
Smiles that grow and linger on.

Do you feel dejected, jaded,
Try this remedy of mine—
Look into the school girls faces
Just before the hour of nine.

You may talk of morning zephyrs
And summer evenings cool,
But my tonic is the faces
Of the girls that go to school.

The progressive merchant of to-day owes much of his success to advertising; without it one might as well take down his sign and invite the sheriff to walk in and close up his business. Constant advertising, properly manipulated, makes a lasting impression.

TEN MINUTES TO TWELVE

BY M. G. M'CLELLAND.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

had seemed pretty equally divided between nephews and niece, and without overt declaration to that effect on her part, the family feeling had been that the young people would share and share alike in the property. When, therefore, on the old lady's death it had been discovered that the entire estate had been willed to the niece without reservation, the nephews not unnaturally suspected, and what is more, being men of choleric temper, proclaimed aloud that there had been undue influence.

It is true that, while the men disported themselves according to their pleasure, the woman had nursed and tended her relative with loving care and patience. But this did not strike the brothers as affording sufficient reason for the will being made so unequivocally in their sister's favor, since anxiety and care and household pains and troubles fell naturally within a woman's province. Perhaps they recognized the family foible, too, and the fact that to those who love dominion the possession of wealth is apt to secure it. They forbore from suit to break the will, first because the family lawyer assured them that they had not a leg to stand on, and furthermore because their very souls abhorred a public scandal. They made evident their sense of wrong in forcible and intemperate language, giving their sister to understand that they were distinctly disappointed in her, and then leaving her to her conscience.

For many years family relations were somewhat strained, and then the war broke out and all smaller fires were extinguished in the national conflagration. Miss Royal, by that time a woman past her first youth, and saddened by a dead romance, retired to a lonely plantation in the mountains of Virginia, where she led an isolated life, filled only with old books, old influences and old imaginings. Such neighbors of her own caste as were accessible were people with views as primitive and experience but little larger than her own. Her life and environment interplayed to foster conceptions of duty and of moral obligation such as to the world at large would be untenable, and, as time went on, her views became more and more unpractical, conservative and romantic. She was a woman of sturdy will and domineering spirit, and, while kind of heart by nature, prone to let that kindness flow only along channels of her own making. Her northern property, safely invested and well cared for, suffered no change by the chances of war, and gave her, in her own eyes and those of other people, a fictitious but readily admitted value.

Whether her conscience smote her about the money or not, the family feeling, so strong in the south, throve in spite of wrong and insult, and when the war brought troubles and financial straits to the brothers the sister rallied to them, helping them through many a tight place, and only stipulating that she should have her own way in regard to time and method. Her influence in her family increased in ratio proportionate to her ability to play Providence to them, and playing Providence—ordering the procession for other people in accordance with her own ideas of that which would be best—was, as has been stated, the role for which the self willed lady considered herself peculiarly adapted.

When one brother died, leaving behind him a motherless and only daughter of tender years, Miss Royal adopted his child and brought her up as her own. She also displayed vivid interest in the son of her other brother, not only because he was a lad of parts and promise, but also because he had been called "John Hart," after a beloved first cousin whose untimely death had caused her to pass mateless through life. She had the boy with her continually, and charged herself with his education and establishment in a profession. That the idea of a marriage between the cousins should develop in her mind was only to be expected. Consanguinity was not considered an objection to marriage in the Virginia of her day, and she had contemplated such a union for herself. This nephew and niece formed her strongest emotional outlet, and she was not willing to let their lives diverge from hers or from each other's. She wanted to blend her past with their future so that, in some occult way, they might live out the life she had pictured for herself ere John Hart had passed into the infinite. Her motive was the highest of which she was capable. She yearned for happiness for them, and it never occurred to her that it could be secured in better ways than those of her own devising. Her idiosyncrasy is not remarkable. Human love in its manifestations is apt to be compelling and coercive.

Matters went smoothly, for the boy's choice of a profession fell in with her wishes for him. There had always been physicians in the Royal family—some distinguished ones. The love of healing might be said to run in the blood.

At one-and-twenty John Royal returned from Philadelphia with his diploma in his pocket, and further fulfilled his destiny by falling in love with his cousin Phyllis, then a girl of 16. A boy-and-girl marriage was no part of Miss Royal's plan for the young people. She wanted John to become a distinguished surgeon, and as his whole heart, or rather mind, was set on his profession, she yielded readily to his wish for a few years in the Vienna and Paris hospitals. An engagement between the cousins was sanctioned, and the understanding was that the marriage should take place as soon as, in her aunt's opinion, Phyllis should be old enough.

Of the reasons for six years [illegible] — his marriage, and of his residence during that time abroad, John Royal did not speak; they were not germane to the matter in hand. His wish was to present the main facts of the case and to force upon his listener the necessity for immediate action.

At the end of the six years news had come of his aunt's sudden death, and with it a letter from her executor informing him of the terms of her will. These were a little singular, and more than a little arbitrary, which, however, was in accordance with the character of the testatrix. The property, of considerable value and duly enumerated, with the exception of a small legacy or two, was left absolutely to John Hart Royal and Phyllis Royal as a marriage gift, provided their marriage to each other should take place between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock on Dec. 28, 18—. In the event of the marriage not taking place on the day and during the hour appointed, there were restrictions laid upon the property which would prove a serious annoyance to the legatees; and in the further event of the marriage not taking place at all, the entire property was to be converted into money and divided, share and share alike, among her kindred of Royal blood from the first to the third degree, Phyllis and John to have an equal portion with the rest, but not a stiver more on behalf of nearer kinship.

The story was given in short sentences, with rests between to spare the patient's strength. The energetic brain of the listener grasped the situation in its entirety, and his sympathies were more than ever aroused. To him it appeared a terribly mean advantage to take of the power which the possession of wealth confers. His first restive impulse was to say, "Let the money go to the devil, and marry the young lady to suit yourself;" but a glance at the face before him sent back the words unspoken. A well man, hale and strong, could afford to assert his independence, to take his own life and that of another into his own hands. But when a man lay dying the case was different; he must do that which he could, not that which he would, to secure the future of the woman thrown so absolutely upon his honor and protection. Royal's pity for the pair [illegible] apace, and he felt that there was not much he would stick at to circumvent the misery entailed by that "iniquitous will," as he styled it in his thought.

"Are there many kindred?" he queried, forgetful that his own name might entitle him to a position as residuary legatee.

"Legions of 'em," John Royal responded irritably. "My aunt had forty-five first cousins, and the bulk of them of Royal blood. I've heard her say so scores of times. In the second count, God and the census taker alone know what the tally may be. 'Tisn't worth while even to wonder about the third. It's a good property, but the sands of Egypt wouldn't divide up handsomely among the Royal clan."

After a moment he went on: "I feel like the veriest scoundrel that ever drew breath! But for her determination to bring about this marriage my aunt would have left her money to Phyllis. The only thing I can do for her now is to marry her before 12 o'clock to-morrow, and God only knows how it's to be managed! That cursed accident!" His eyes were filled with yearning pain.

The doctor smiled cheerily and looked at his watch. "Don't fret," he said; "it's bad for you. The marriage is the main thing, and we can secure that. I'll take that 4:30 train and go after the young lady, and you can be married at once. The conditions, whatever they may be, must be put up with. It's a case of half a loaf or no bread. By the way, what are the conditions?" He rose as he put the question.

"That neither Phyllis nor myself shall touch one cent of the money for ten years, dating from midday to-morrow."

"The devil!"

"You may well exclaim!"—speaking fast and bitterly. "The marriage before 12 o'clock to-morrow would leave my poor girl comfortable and cared for; after 12, as good as a pauper. And she's helpless—helpless"— His voice broke and he turned his head away.

Royal felt something hot and stinging rush into his own eyes; his heart ached for the pain he could not mitigate.

The head on the pillow turned again; the eyes sought Royal's appealingly, coercively:

"Man, have you no help for me? Haven't you science or skill enough to put vitality into this miserable carcass sufficient to enable me to drag it a few miles further? Can't you do anything for me?" The sense of impotence was strong upon him; his voice was hoarse and feeble, his eyes showed that he knew beforehand what the answer must be.

Royal put out his hand to him pitifully, but shook his head:

"My poor fellow, God himself couldn't help you that way. Stop a minute and let me think. There ought to be a way out of it—there must be a way out of it, if only I were smart enough to see it. Don't fret, please. It exhausts vitality and does no good. Try to rest."

The closing phrases were born of professional instinct and delivered mechanically. His mind was busy with the problem he had set himself to solve. He was a man quick to trust his own judgment and to form new plans. Emphatically a man of action, prompt in conception, prompt also and untiring in execution. Dr. Royal's mind worked habitually along positive lines. To rush at a difficulty and carry it by assault was the method which most recommended itself to him, and the active, practical life of the frontier had fostered his natural proclivities. There was little of the "shivering and shaking on the bank" so condemned of the English wit about Hart Royal. To "jump in and scramble through" as well as he could might be reckoned his rule of conduct.

The plan he elaborated within the next half hour might, as a legal measure, be open to question, but it possessed the merit of tangibility and could be put into immediate execution. It was, in brief, that John Royal, flat on his back on that which might well be his dying bed, in Matoacca, should at the appointed hour on the following day marry his cousin, on the other side of the mountains, by proxy.

"I don't know how the law stands," the originator of the scheme admitted, "and there isn't time to look it up. I never heard of a marriage by proxy outside of a novel, to be sure; but if a man can marry by telephone I don't see why he can't be married by proxy. To me it looks as though it would give a fighting chance for immediate possession of the money. You can have the marriage recelebrated if the lady should prefer it. She will join you at once, of course."

The sick man caught at the plan. His own knowledge of the laws of the commonwealth in regard to marriage was nebulous, but to him also the scheme proposed seemed to offer a fighting chance, and even that appeared of priceless value. His eagerness was pitiful, his insistence almost aggressive. The poor fellow, drifting into the shadow of the inevitable, yet holding back with terrible earnestness, with yearning tenderness, not for his own sake, but for that of the woman left to his care, the pathos of it dimmed Royal's gray eyes more than once, and acted as a spur to his helpful, sympathetic nature.

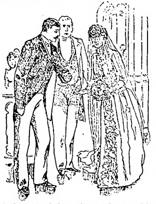
There was no question in the mind of either man as to who should be the representative. The bond of the order had done away with all strangeness or sense of obligation between them, even before the recognition of the deeper, human brotherhood had come. Royal made the necessary arrangements for the care of the sick man during his absence, and also provided himself with the wedding ring which he found in his namesake's pocket. The license would be waiting at the other end of the line, John Royal said; he had written about it from the hospital to the gentleman in whose family his cousin had lived since their aunt's death.

In the urgent need of haste it occurred to neither man that Dr. Royal, being a stranger, should have some sort of credentials, or that it might be necessary for a proxy to have a written power of representation, as it were, from his principal. Nor did the thought that the similarity of name might cause a complication suggest itself. The sick man was unaware of the coincidence, and the mind of the other was filled with weightier matters. There was little time for detail.

CHAPTER III.

Whether or not malevolent spirits have power of interference in human affairs is an open question; but certain it is that, to prima facie view, events can at times arrange themselves with a malignant disregard of individual needs and desires which would leave nothing to the invention of the most perverse devil the imagination could conjure up. Also certain is it that everlasting truths anent the inexorable interplay of circumstance and environment and the operation of unchangeable laws fail of the recognition and reverence they merit when interplay and action combine to knock the foundations from under a man's personal calculations. And the individual thus stranded is a good deal more apt to blaspheme like a stevedore than to accept the situation like a rational and scientific gentleman.

The train which left Matoacca at 4:30 pulled into the little mountain station at 10:55, when, according to a perjured schedule, it should have been there at 10 sharp. There was no reason that Royal could discover for such flagrant breach of contract save the unhastefulness of a single track road with no competition and few connections. Passengers, employes and even the engine appeared content to take it easy over the mountains, and when Royal in a frenzy of impatience entered protest he was met by the conductor with intolerable good humor and the assurance that matters might be much more unsatisfactory.



And received from the hands of a white haired gentleman his unknown bride.

"We used to aim to be on time," the official observed cheerfully, "but these here grades are tremenjeous heavy, an' the curves sharper 'n common. The 'hind coach jumps the track once in a while if she ain't humored, an' it takes a durned sight longer to h'ist her back with fence rails 'en it does to run keerful."

"The schedule oughtn't to say one thing and the road do another," rebuked Royal. "It's an imposition on the public."

"Well, it don't look considerate," acquiesced the conductor, then added, with the esprit de corps of all railway men, "We do make it most in general. Sometimes, like today, we gets bothered. It

HOW MAN CAME.

An Account of the Creation That Has Elements of Logic.

There are new stories of a legendary nature that are not related in several different forms. A correspondent of the Chicago News, who read the Indian legend of the creation, sends the following excellent version of it:

When the Great Spirit created the world he first made three men, all the same color. Then he led them to a pool of water and bade them jump in and bathe. One of them obeying at once leaped in in advance of his fellows and came out clean and white.

The others hesitated, but one soon followed the first. When he went in the water had become somewhat stained and he came out copper-colored.

Then the third man went in. By that time the water of the pool had become black and he was consequently black when he had bathed.

Thus it happens there are white men, red men and black men in the world.

Then the Great Spirit laid down three packages before the three men, which contained the future fate. Out of pity for the black man he permitted him to have his first choice of the parcels.

The black man without hesitation, took the largest parcel; the red man whose turn was next took the next largest parcel, and the white man got the remaining one, which was very small.

Then the men opened their packages. That of the black man was found to contain shovels and other implements of labor, the red man's contained bows and arrows, and the white man's small parcel consisted of pens, ink and tools for light work.

From that time on each man made use of the tools he had chosen.

Where "Mark Twain" Works.

"Mark Twain" has a queer trinity of literary adjuncts in his workshop. It consists of his pen, corn-cob pipe and a billard cue. Practically, he has two "dens" in his home, one being his bedroom where he often writes for an hour before breakfast. But the most of his work is done in a room at the top of his house, which serves as billiard room and literary den combined. When at work the humorist's corncob pipe is his constant companion, and when he is weary of writing he turns to his billard table. He plays an excellent game of billards, and is really an expert with the cue. One side of the wall is entirely taken up with a case having in it not less than two dozen cues. In a corner of the room is his desk, with a photograph beside it into which are dropped stray thoughts or lines for "a story some time to be written." Mark Twain undoubtedly gets a quantity of solid comfort out of this life. Nothing ruffles him; few things bother him even for a moment. He works only when in the mood, for with a big income from his published books, the pen is no longer a necessary breadwinner. He has a delightful home, owns a big farm besides, has a prosperous publishing business, smokes his pipe, and takes life easier than any literary man I know of.

THE report that Philadelphia is about ready to set up a handsome monument to George Washington, the subscription for which were commenced ninety-three years ago, has given fresh confidence and courage to the trustees of the New York Grant monument fund.

THE PEOPLE'S PARTY

A New Political Party the Outcome of the Conference at Cincinnati.

Its Birth Announced by Scenes of the Greatest Confusion and the Wildest Hilarity.

Cincinnati, Special.—Whatever its outcome the big convention which assembled here was inaugurated in a fashion of which any American citizen might well be proud.

Fifteen hundred representatives of the bone and sinew of the nation, gathered alike from farm and city toil, came to order on the very watch-tick that had months before been agreed upon, lifted their voices in magnificent diapason in a hymn to their country, said together in reverential unison the Lord's prayer, and then calmly proceeded to fight out as best their manhood directed the question whether or not a great new political party in the United States should forthwith be given existence.

The first real excitement in the convention was caused by no less a person than Ignatius Donnelly of Minnesota. He did it with a harmless-looking little suggestion, that, to save time, the appointment of committemen by each state be completed in a lump, each state naming all of its committeemen at once, including the member of the national committee.

This led to a very warm discussion in which Gen. Weaver of Iowa, wasted the sage and charged him with trying to pledge the convention on the sly to the formation of a third party. Donnelly disclaimed any intention to take an undue advantage.

The Chairman came to the rescue and declared the motion out of order.

After the appointment of a committee on resolutions the convention adjourned until tomorrow.

The committee on resolutions consists of one member from each state represented, they met in the evening and organized by electing Ignatius Donnelly, chairman.

SECOND DAY.

The convention amused itself while waiting for the report of the committee on resolutions in passing the hat to defray the expenses of the convention and to send a colored alliance man home.

The report of the committee on order of business elicited applause when the programme outlined showed a place for the appointment of members of

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

Opposition was manifested at once to the proposition to limit all speeches to five minutes. A lady delegate from South Dakota got the floor and pleaded with the men folks to please not try to cut things off so short. Cries of "We are here for business" was the reply from a score, and attempts to debate the question were howled down in short order. The five-minute rule carried the day.

It was necessary to apply the previous question gag before a vote could be obtained on the report of the committee on order of business. Then the report went through like a cannon ball. How the convention did screech when the vote was announced.

"That means a third party right now," shouted an excited Kansan. "We are going to have a national committee, don't you see? And that is what we have been after. We've won the first victory, anyhow. Hooray, I say—hooray!"

Pandemonium broke loose from ceiling to floor. While the applause was still making the windows rattle Senator Peffer opened his powerful lungs, and, with a mighty effort, made himself heard sufficiently to declare the convention adjourned till 2 p. m.

A PROTEST FROM POLK.

When the convention reassembled a letter from L. L. Polk was read advising this conference to issue an address, and defer action on a third party until 1892. This caused a breeze, and when a motion to refer it to the committee on resolutions was declared carried there was a loud demand—notably from the Minnesota delegation—that the negative be put more forcibly by the chair. The demand was renewed and continued from time to time during the reading of a number of miscellaneous telegrams.

Mr. Fish of Minnesota argued that Mr. Polk's letter was ill-timed, and claimed that it showed how useless it would be to refer the third party question to the meeting in 1892, at which Polk and his followers will be leading spirits.

Ignatius Donnelly, chairman of the committee on resolutions, climbed on the rostrum at this juncture and almost his first words caused a whirlwind of excitement. The declaration from Donnelly, which set the convention wild, was that he was there to report that the committee on platform was a unit for the organization of a third party. Donnelly evidently felt that his moment of triumph had come in the struggle which he himself so deftly began just twenty-four hours before, and for which he had been so by Gen. Weaver of Iowa. Two alternatives were presented, he said; either to ignore a third party or divide the friends of reform.

He gave way to Robert Schilling of Wisconsin, secretary of the committee, who read the platform. The name of the new party, the "People's Party of the United States," elicted a magnificent outburst of applause, and, as each plank was read, the cheering was renewed so frequently that the great hall seemed to reverberate continuously.

A plank recommended universal suffrage to favorable consideration, and another demanded payment of pensions on a gold basis. The former met with a rather chilly reception, but the latter was roundly cheered.

At this juncture a delegate objected that the platform was one-sided for the Farmers' Alliance, but he met with little encouragement, and Schilling declared that the convention was for harmony, and for the "new declaration of independence." He announced that the pension plank was left to the soldier member on the committee, with an inquiry whether it was satisfactory, and, on his acquiescence, it was adopted unanimously.

The convention went wild and mounted tables, chairs, like Comanches. A portion of the convention sang to the tune of "Good-bye My Lover, Good-bye, the words "Good-bye old parties, good-bye." and then the "Doxology." The tumult surpassing in its remarkable suddenness and vigors, anything that had previously taken place in the convention lasted fully a quarter of an hour, till it ceased from sheer exhaustion of the delegates.

SHOUTING AND YELLING

The platform proper, exclusive of the resolutions, was then adopted by a rising vote. At this stage the convention was little better than a howling mob, and in the midst of the confusion G. M. Hiller of California came to the front on the prohibition question, which had been ignored in the platform and resolutions. All efforts to choke him off with points of order were ineffectual. The resolution offered by him was brief, but to the point. It said: "Resolved, That we favor the abolition of the liquor traffic."

Confusion became worse confounded. Fifty orators were clamoring for recognition, but the first to succeed was Schilling of Wisconsin. He declared himself a strong temperance man, one who neither drank nor even smoked, but he opposed the discussion of the question of prohibition at this time. Mr. Schilling declared that the resolution proposed by Mr. Miller had been fully considered and voted down by the committee on platform. To spring it now was plainly throwing a fire brand into the convention, and in his opinion it was a deliberate attempt

TO CAUSE A SPLIT IN THE PARTY.

The pressure at this time for recognition was extraordinary. In desperation the chair proposed to give ten of the most vociferous delegates, who were crowded about his desk clamoring for recognition, one minute each, and a hundred watches were pulled out to make sure that none of the speakers exceeded the sixty-seconds limit.

The prohibition amendment was overwhelmingly defeated.

The resolutions were then adopted with only three dissenting votes.

At this juncture Gen. J. B. Weaver relieved Chairman Peffer, who was worn out with his fruitless efforts to preserve order, and had besides to catch a train for Washington. A resolution against trusts was choked off by a point of order raised by Schilling of Wisconsin, that all resolutions should be referred to the committee on resolutions without being read. Then the convention got down to business again and the matter of choosing a national committee was taken up. Chairman Weaver declared a welcome recess to enable the overheated, exhausted delegates to select members of the national committee from their respective states.

After the selection of the committee there were a few moments of confused preparation for adjournment sine die, then the chairman's gavel fell and the first convention of the People's party of the United States had passed into history.

THE PLATFORM.

Following is the platform in full as presented to the convention:

That in view of the great social, industrial and economical revolution now dawning upon the civilized world, and the new and living issues confronting the American people, we believe that the time has arrived for a crystallization of the political reform forces of our country, and the formation of what should be known as the People's party of the United States of America.

That we most heartily endorse the demands of the platforms as adopted at St. Louis, Mo., in 1889, Ocala, Fla., in 1890, and Omaha, Neb., in 1891, by industrial organizations there represented, summarized as follows:

The right to make and issue money is a sovereign power to be maintained by the people for the common benefit, hence we demand the abolition of national banks as banks of issue, and as a substitute for national bank notes we demand that legal tender treasury notes be issued in sufficient volume to transact the business of the country on a cash basis, without damage or especial advantage to any class or calling, such notes to be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, and such notes, when demanded by the people, shall be loaned to them at not more than 2 per cent per annum upon non-perishable products, as indicated in the subtreasury plan, and also upon real estate, with proper limitation upon the quantity of land and amount of money.

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

We demand the passage of laws prohibiting alien ownership of land, and that congress take prompt action to devise some plan to obtain all lands now owned by aliens and foreign syndicates, and that all lands now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of such as actually used and needed by them be reclaimed by the government, and held for actual settlers only.

Believing the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privilege to none, we demand that taxation, national, state or municipal, shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another.

We demand that all revenues, national, state or county, shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the government, economically and honestly administered.

We demand a just and equitable system of graduated tax on income.

We demand the most rigid, honest and just national control and supervision of the means of public communication and transportation, and if this control and supervision does not remove the abuses now existing, we demand the government ownership of such means of communication and transportation.

We demand the election of president, vice president and United States senators by a direct vote of the people.

That we urge united action of all progressive organizations in attending the conference called for Feb. 22, 1892, by six of the leading reform organizations.

That a national central committee be appointed by this conference, to be composed of a chairman, to be elected by this body, and of three members from each state represented, to be named by each state delegation.

That this central committee shall represent this body, attend the national conference on Feb. 22, 1892, and if possible unite with that and all other reform organizations there assembled. If no satisfactory arrangement can be effected, this committee shall call a national convention, not later than June 1, 1892, for the purpose of nominating candidates for president and vice president.

That the members of the central committee for each state where there is no independent political organization conduct an active system of political agitation in their respective states.

NOT IN THE PLATFORM.

Following are resolutions submitted for consideration, and not contained in the platform:

Resolved, That the question of universal suffrage be recommended to the favorable consideration of the various states and territories.

That while the party in power in 1869 pledged the faith of the nation to pay a debt in coin that had been contracted on a depreciated currency basis and payable in currency, thus adding nearly $1,000,000,000 to the burdens of the people, which meant gold for the bondholders and depreciated currency for the soldier, and holding that the men who imperiled their lives to save the life of a nation should have been paid in money as good as that paid to the bondholder, we demand the issue of legal tender treasury notes in sufficient amount to make the pay of the soldiers equal to par with coin, or such other legislation as shall do equal and exact justice to the Union soldiers of this country.

That, as eight hours constitute a legal day's work for government employes in mechanical departments, we believe this principle should be farther extended so as to apply to all corporations employing labor in the different states of the Union.

That this conference condemns in unmeasured terms the action of the directors of the World's Columbian Exposition, on May 19, in refusing the minimum rate of wages asked for by the labor organizations of Chicago.

That the attorney general of the United States should make immediate provision to submit the act of March 2, 1889, providing for the opening of Oklahoma to homestead settlement, to the United States supreme court, so that the expensive and dilatory litigation now pending there be ended.

The following resolution introduced by Mason A. Green of Massachusetts in behalf of the Nationalists was referred to the various reform bodies for their adoption:

That when in the course of business consolidations in the form of trusts or private syndicates it becomes evident that any branch of commerce is used for the behoof and profit of a few men at the expense of the general public, we believe that the people should assume charge of such commerce through their national, state or municipal administration.

Three Paces.

Convicts who were forced to drag about a ball and chain at the galleys could often be detected, when released, by their habit of trailing one foot after the other. John Boyle O'Reilly, condemmed to convict life in Australia for his Fenian sympathies, had also in after years a habit which told a like sad story. Says a friend in his recent "Life."

When walking abstractedly and mechanically, he always went a short distance, and then retraced his steps, no matter how wide a stretch he had before him.

It was always three paces forward, turn, and three paces back, exactly like the restless turning of a lion in a cage. One day I asked him:

"Boyle, what was the length of your cell when you were in prison? How many paces?"

"Three," he said. Why do you ask?"

"Because, when you are absent-minded, you always walk three paces forward, and then retrace your steps."

SLAIN BY A BULLET.

A Would-Be Jail Breaker Killed at Devils Lake, N. D., by a Deputy Sheriff.

He Was Making a Desperate Attack on the Sheriff With a Heavy Padlock.

Devils Lake, N. D., Special Telegram, May 27.—Edward W. Heerman, a prisoner in jail, was killed to-day by Deputy Sheriff Gilbert Olson.

Sheriff Wagness had ordered Heerman into his cell. Heerman refused to obey. Wagness told the prisoner that he should be compelled to put him in by force if he refused to obey his order. Heerman thereupon made a desperate attack on the sheriff, beginning operations by throwing a handful of salt which he had secreted from his morning's meal in the eyes of Wagness, dealing him at the same time several severe blows about the head and face with a large padlock held firmly in his hand.

Sheriff Wagness, stunned by the blows and nearly blinded, dropped his pistol. At this juncture Deputy Olson arrived, and a scramble ensued for the weapon, which was secured by the deputy who, seeing the sheriff hors de combat and fearing for his own life, quickly fired at the prisoner. The shot took effect in the groin and proved fatal, the victim dying in about two hours from the time he was shot.

Although but twenty years old, Heerman was a desperate character, having on former occasions brutally attacked jail officials. There is no doubt but for the timely arrival and quick action of Deputy Oleson, Sheriff Wagness would have been killed.

When Heerman was told his wound would prove fatal he sent for Sheriff Wagness and told him that he was exonerated from all blame, for he had made up his mind to kill any one that stood in the way of his escape.

WOES OF A YOUNG WIFE.

She Is Taken West, Cruelly Beaten and Then Deserted.

Seattle, Wash., Special Telegram, May 27.—Mrs. J. W. Kreider, who left here today for Chicago, tells a terrible story of suffering at the hands of a fickle husband and a hateful father-in-law, the latter being E. C. Kreider, one of the wealthiest and most prominent citizens in Illinois.

Young Kreider met his wife, Miss Adelaide Holmes, in Chicago a year ago, and after a brief courtship married her three months ago. Miss Holmes' only relatives were a widowed mother and two brothers. Her father, up to three years ago, when he died, had been at the head of a large merchant tailoring establishment in Chicago; He had reared his family well, and at his death left quite an estate, and the family lived well.

The marriage brought forth a storm of indignation from the father, but of this the with heard but little. Her mother and brothers returned to England to live. A short period of happiness followed and then came a sudden decision on the part of the husband to come West. A month ago Mr. and Mrs. Kreider arrived in Seattle, going thence to Fairhaven, where they located. The husband intimated that his father wanted him to leave his wife. She knew this and said little.

Suddenly, one day two weeks since, young Kreider returned in a drunken condition to the country residence of Mr. Wheeler of Fairhaven, where the man and his wife were stopping as guests. Entering the house he attacked his wife and beat her most cruelly. The arrest of young Kreider followed immediately, but the case did not come to a hearing. On his release he deserted his wife and fled to Chicago over the Canadian Pacific.

A few letters from sire to son which the poor woman found explained it all. She had been brought West to be gotten rid of. Mrs. Kreider came to Seattle last week where the great strain caused her to break down, but careful nursing restored her. When her story was learned counsel was retained, and through the legal firm's correspondents in Chicago action for divorce and full restitution for the indignities heaped upon her was begun.

E. C. Kreider, the father-in-law, is president of a large flour mill company and one of the owners of the Jacksonville Journal and posseses other newspaper interests. He was prominently mentioned before the last election as a candidate for state treasurer on the Republican ticket.

THE DUELISTS.

Their Present Whereabouts and Condition Known Only to a Few.

Chicago, May 27.—The whereabouts of Baron Rudolph Kalnoky, who is reported to have fought a duel yesterday morning in Jackson park, is unknown, save to a few who will not talk.

At the Richelieu no additional information can be secured, everybody being in a state of ignorance. Manager Carlson was told yesterday morning that the duel had been fought. But he declines to state who told him, for the reason toat he gave his word of honor he would keep silent on that part of the tale. He declares that he knows nothing about the identity of the count's opponent, that neither are in the hotel and that their present location is to him unknown.

NOT COUNT KALNOKY'S NEPHEW.

Vienna, May 26.—Inquiries made here show that Baron Rudolph Kalnoky de Korospatak, who is announced to have fought a duel yesterday at Chicago with a young Southerner, is not a nephew of Count Kalnoky, in this city. Count Kalnoky has no relative bearing the name of Rudolph Kalnoky de Korospatak, nor has he a relative now in America.

FOUGHT A DUEL.

Seattle, Wash., May 27.—Two variety performers named Leonard and Gilmore quarreled to-day over a woman and agreed to fight a duel to settle it.

They retired to a room and began slashing each other with knives. Leonard soon fell with eight terrible gashes in the body and soon died.

A Victory for Pickler.

Washington, Special Telegram, May 27.—The order for a change in the boundary lines between the Chamberlain and Pierre district was issued to-day, notwithstanding the protest of Pettigrew. Representative Pickler wins a victory over the senator. The change throws a strip eight miles wide, formerly in the Chamberlain district, into the Pierre district, most of the land being covered by settlement. The line takes in all the land except the southern tier of townships of Nelson county, which leaves the Chamberlain district with very little land occupied at present upon which filings may be made. The Bad river country is now in the Pierre district.

DEFAULTER BARDSLEY.

He Is Watched by Detectives, Being Too Ill to Leave His Bed.

Philadelphia, May 27.—City Treasurer Bardsley's condition was still so serious this morning that he was unable to appear before Magistrate Pole to answer to the charge of misappropriating $39,000 of the city money. His counsel appeared and presented a physician's certificate setting forth that it would be dangerous to attempt to make Mr. Bardsley leave his bed at this time, but stating that he was improving and would probably be able to appear in a few days. The hearing was continued until Friday and bail was fixed at $25,000.

This afternoon Attorney General Hensel had an affidavit prepared and presented to Magistrate Pole, charging John Bardsley with having collected $367,604 belonging to the State of Pennsylvania and failing to account for the same, although lawful demands had been made therefor by the proper state officers. Magistrate Pole thereupon increased Bardsley's bail from $25,000 to $50,000. Two detectives have remained in a room adjoining Mr. Bardsley's bed room since Saturday night, when the first warrant was served.

Up to late this afternoon Gideon W. Marsh, the fugitive president of the Keystone National bank, had not been located.

The special committee of the council that is investigating the city depositories met again this afternoon. Francis W. Kennedy, president of the suspended Spring Garden bank, testified that the bank had paid Mr. Bardsley fully half he had on deposit. This money was deposited to the credit of John Bardsley, trustee, but the witness understood that the money belonged to the state. Mr. Kennedy made the surprising statement that on the morning of the bank's suspension he sent to Bardsley $47,000 with collateral.

The finance committee of councils met this evening and was presented by City Controller Thompson with a list of the due bills held by Bardsley from the Keystone bank, which Mr. Thompson had recieved from Bardsley's counsel. There are fourteen of these due bills, all of which were given during the yer 1890, and they aggregate $945,000. On one of the bills there was a credit of $20,000, leaving a total of $925,000.

A FATAL MISTAKE.

Untimely Death of Congressman L. C. Houk of Tennessee.

Knoxville., Tenn., May 27.—Judge L. C. Houk, representative in congress from the Second Tennessee district, died to-day.

Yesterday he went to a drug store near his residence to get a prescription put up. The druggist compounded it for him and set it down in a glass near another containing a strong solution of arsenic, which Judge Houk took by mistake.

Antidotes were promptly administered and last night he was so well that nothing was said about the circumstance, except to a few friends. He slept through the night and died this morning suddenly. He had heart disease and the poison and excitement following the incident affected that organ and were the cause of his death.

A FIRE BUG CONFESSES.

Then a Prominent Citizen of St. Cloud Is Arrested.

St. Cloud, Minn., Special Telegram, May 27.—Last night neighbors discovered the residence property of Harry Brauch, proprietor of the Grand Union hotel, in flames on the outside, but subdued the fire.

This morning the police arrested Nichols Karets, a young bartender, for the crime. After being in jail a few hours Karets sent for the chief of police and made a confession. He said that Brauch had agreed to give him $500 for burning the building, on which there was $2,500 insurance. With the money obtained in this way Brauch said He would go West and join a Mrs. Hart, who formerly was landlady of the hotel, and with whom it is alleged Brauch has endeavored to elope several times.

Brauch was arrested. He is a over fifty years of age; was possessed of a good deal of property and had always been regarded as a good citizen. He has a family of grown up children.

SOUTH HAVEN SCORCHED.

A Disastrous Fire in a Wright County Village.

St. Cloud, Minn., Special Telegram, May 27.—Reports were received here to-day of a disastrous fire which visited South Haven, a little hamlet just across the line from this county in Wright county, Saturday night. The conflagration started in the general merchandise store of A. J. Lano, and his family, who lived over the store, escaped with difficulty.

The fire was communicated thence to Mobitor & Perry's store and to the dwelling house of W. C. Weeks. Lano's loss is $6,000, with $3,000 insurance; Monitor & Perry's, $2,000, with no insurance; Weeks', $500, with no instrance. Spontaneous combustion was the origin of the fire.

HANGING IN A CELLAR.

Mysterious Taking Off of an Iowa Woman and Her Four Children.

Harlan, Iowa, May 27.—Mrs. Christen Pederson, a Danish woman, and four children, aged from five to ten, were found hanging in the cellar of their house, three miles north of this town, yesterday. It is thought they have been hanging since Wednesday night, the 20th inst. The husband was sent to the insane asylum about a week ago, and this series of murders and suicide shows that his wife should have accompanied him, as she must have been violently insane.

THE BAPTISTS.

Seventy-Seventh Anniversary of the Baptist Missionary Union.

Cincinnati, May 27.—The seventy-seventh anniversary of the American Baptist Missionary union was observed to-day. This is the oldest society of the Baptists. The chairman, Rev. Dr. Northrop, president of the Chicago Theological seminary, delivered an address.

Timber Culture Entries.

Washington, May 27.—In answer to a letter on the subject, the acting commissioner of the land office to-day sent out the following: "Parties may commute timber culture entries at $1.25 per acre under the act of March 3, 1891, whether within railroad limits or not, on proof of compliance with law for four years, when the entry is valid, and not forfeited by subse quent failure to comply with the law."

Delirious From an Assault.

Peoria, Ill., May 27.—To-day Anna Gerber, a school teacher of Hilton, was met in a lonely wood while going to her school by George Ditch, of this city, who dragged her into the woods. The girl gave him her watch and money if he would allow her to go, and he promised to do so. He ran around in the woods and intercepted her again. In the struggle which followed her clothes were torn off and she was terribly beaten. Ditch was frightened away. The girl dragged herself to the nearest house, where she now lies delirious and not expected to survive the night. Armed men are searching the woods for Ditch, and if caught he will be lynched.

Instruments of Torture.

It is stated that the renowned collection of mediæval instruments of torture at Nuremberg has been sold to a London company. Prima facie we should doubt that the municipality of a town so famous for its antique relics would be willing—or, indeed, would be permitted—to dispose of a collection unique, so far as we know. Nor do the projects of the London company, as described, incline us to the faith. But the report is circumstantial. Our enterprising fellow citizens propose to exhibit their treasures in the chief towns of Europe, and then to put them up for auction. Furthermore, it is asserted that the authorities of Berlin already look forward to the sale, and meditate buying the lot in bulk.

Doubtless an exhibition of the appliances of torture, authenticated by at least the belief of generations, would draw proudigiously. It is strange how few instruments of the sort survive possessing serious claims to confidence. Our own specimens in the tower are just as authentic as the block on which, as the worthy beef eater declares, Anna Boleyn lost her head. It is easy to understand that the governer or officials in charge of an old state prison would destroy such terribly irritating objects if they had time, when threatened by events that might lead to an exposure. Thus we are not surprised to learn that no machinery for torture was discovered in any of the Inquisition buildings that have been seized. But there are so many cases where it seems improbable that they would have removed or broken them up, that one is led to suspect the executioner may have kept his smaller instruments, at least, in his own quarters.—London Standard.

The Story of a Vicissitudinous Career.

At Saint-Gall, Switzerland, an old colonel named Martignoni has just died at the age of 80. He had abundant opportunity for acquiring a practical knowledge of men and manners. No romance-writer would dare to give to his hero a career so varied as that of old Martignoni. He began life as a lawyer. Then he turned soldier and fought in the war of the Sonderbund. At the close of that struggle he rose to the bench and served as a judge. Then fortune deserted him and he went down hill until he became a street-sweeper in New York, and afterward a waiter in a coffee and cake saloon. Soon afterward he managed to get to California, where he became a miner. Having been cured of gold fever, he went to England, joined the army, and served under the English colors in the Crimean war. At the end of that difficulty he went to the Argentine Republic. There again fortune deserted him and in a few years he returned to Europe. He labored as a railroad conductor, a policeman and a town clerk, and at last settled down to a quiet life in his native country. His final request was original and easy granted. It was that nobody, except the undertaker and his assistants, should attend his funeral.—New York Sun.

A Good Ghost Story,

New York World.

As I lay awake one night I saw coming through the door a small volume of smoke that gradually enlarged until it assumed the figure of a rather tall lady. It kept advancing backward until it reached the center of the room, the train fully extended the while. I viewed the apparition of smoke, and there was a bridal dress, a marvel of the dressmaker's art. I was so absorbed with the make-up of the trousseau I hadn't noticed the face, but when I did there stood my aunt, who had been in Europe for years. In that face I saw such terror, anguish and pain depicted that I could hardly refrain from crying with pity. Suddenly she turned her face full on me, lighted up with a heavenly smile, and then gradually faded away.

In about a fortnight I received word saying that on the date of my vision occurred the nuptial ball of my aunt, when she, with five others, was burned to death, their clothing having taken fire. Inquiry proved that my vision was a counterpart of her trousseau, even to her ornaments and the dressing of her hair.

The Squadron of Evolution.

Boston Budget.

In a certain would-be literary circle in Boston there is a lady who prides herself upon her intimate knowledge of things in general and of the English language in particular, and in her small but exclusive set she is looked upon as an authority. When the fleet was here several of her friends were gathered at her house, and one of them asked:

"Why do they call it the squadron of 'evolution'?"

"That is very simple answered the lady of the house;" the simplest thing in the world. For a long time they have been at work trying to devise the best kind of war ships, and this is the result; this is what has been, 'evolved.' And so they call it the 'squadron of evolution.' See?"

And then she lay back in her chair, satisfied that she had enlightened her visiters. And the best of it was that they thought, and think to this day that her explanation was correct.

Dunning Cards.

Less than two years ago Congress passed an act making it a criminal offence to mail a postal card containing written or printed matter of a "libellous, scurrilous, defamatory or threatening character, or calculated or obviously intended to reflect injuriously upon the character or conduct of another." The penalty for a violation of the law is a fine not exceeding $5,000, imprisonment for not more than five years or both fine and imprisonment.

Under this statute a St. Louis business man was indicted for mailing these two postals to a customer:

> Please call and settle account, which is long past due, and for which our collector has called several times.

To this the customer evidently paid no attention, as the following was sent to him six days latter:—

> You owe us $1.80. We have called several times for same. If not paid at once we shall place same with our law agency for collection.

The United States district court holds that the sending of the first was not but that the mailing of the second was a criminal offence. The reason given for the distinction is that the second contained a threat to sue, which was "both calculated and intended to humiliat and injure the person addressed in public estimation," while the first was not open to this objection. Of the first Judge Thayer says:

> The language employed is not of a threatening character, and in my opinion, no jury would be warranted in finding, in view of its contents, that it was obviously intended by the writer to reflect injuriously on the character or conduct of the person addressed, or to injure or degrade him in the eyes of the public.
>
> It is true that it contains a demand for the payment of a debt, and says that it is long past due and that a collector has called several times, it is couched in respectful terms and no intent is apparent to put it in such form as to attract public notice or to make it offensive to the person addressed.

In view of the decision, which we think is carrying the law to an extreme hardly warranted, business men will find it prudent either to enclose demands for money in sealed envelopes or to be careful about what they write on postal cards.—Herald.

Improved In Jail.

Every time a batch of jail prisoners are arraigned in the criminal court I am struck by the vast improvement in their personal appearance that a few months' confinement gives them. In 99 cases out of 100 they are a course, brutal, heavy drinking class, and show their low habits in their faces. In the jail they get the whisky out of their skins, the so called jail pallor leaves their faces clear and white, and more or less refined, and they make a better impression upon a jury than they certainly would if brought to trial when first arrested. A striking case in point was Sanders, the dog catcher, who killed Police Officer Printz. When he was first put in jail he was about the toughest, bloated and altogether brutalized specimen of humanity I had ever seen. Eight months later he was brought to trial, It was almost impossible to recognize in the pale, finely drawn features of the quiet, self possessed and entilligent talking prisoner the hoodlum of the previous year. His appearance made such a good impression that he got off with a two years' sentence, when I believe if the same jury had seen him as I did he would have been sent up for life.—Circuit Attorney in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Czar's Family.

The empress of Russia has her daughters much with her, and has not even a so called governess for them. Her own personal attendant and her lady of honor serve also for them. In part this springs from the emperor's love for simplicity of life, but in part, also, that they try to surround themselves with as few people as possible, so that as little as may be concerning their private life should transpire to the outer world, of whom they are, and not without good reason, much afraid. The empress superintends in person the education of the two little grand duchesses, Xenie and Olga, aged respectively 14 and 6. The emperor in his leisure moments tries to do the same for his boys. Especially he loves to give them music and dancing lessons, for he thinks himself a great musician, and has a predilection for the cornet-a-piston.—Leisure Hours.

An Expensive Cigar.

The costliest cigar smoked in New York is said to be a Havana Henry Clay, which is usually sold wrapped in gold or silver foil and which costs $1.25 apiece at retail. As to the cost of manufacture of such a cigar a manufacturer says that it is wholly impossible to make a cigar whose actual cost, with the use of the choicest and most costly material throughout, can exceed twenty-five cents. The cigar retailed in the market for $1 costs the manufacturer about fifteen cents. There is a small added item of expense in stamping, and the boxing may be made more or less costly; but even with these added it will be seen that the profit on the higher grade of cigars is immense.—New York Evening Sun.

It Is Queer

That the two young pugilists who fought last Sunday upon the ball ground were not chucked into the cooler.

That the marshal had a sprained foot when the row was in progress.

That we cannot have a regularly organized ball club.

That there is not some effort on the part of our citizens to get up a Fourth of July celebration.

That where there is every facility such as we have, a company could not be organized to construct a race track and have it ready for July 4th.

That some enterprising individual doesn't start a subscription list for the purpose of raising a fund of $500 or $1,000 to be divided in purses and prize money for the 4th of July celebration.

The Crop Prospects.

The NEWS always gives the facts as they are. We do not believe in submerging the true state of affairs in such matters—it is a mistaken policy. But it is much more agreeable when, like this season, fact is more pleasing than the most brilliant fiction could possibly be. Since spring opened the conditions have been extraordinarily favorable. The lack of rain in the Northwest has been the prime factor in the failure of the wheat crop for the past few years. This misfortune seemed to have settled down with unrelenting determination in the central portion of North Dakota, and even here the reduced yield was, in a large measure the result of it. Early frosts are another source of annoyance and loss. But when the conditions have been favorable in the early sason the crop is usually advanced beyond danger. This year grain all over this section is in grand shape. Never within our recollection was the soil in a better state, nor the grain further advanced. Tuesday another rain fell that will give a great impetus to vegetation in general. From the beginning the elements seemed to pour down the moisture at exactly the proper time. and the effect is manifest.

Washington Correspondence.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1891.—Secretary Blaine is still in New York a very sick man. Dispatches received here to day say he is going home to Maine next week. Nobody in Washington expects to see him again before next fall; and so the Administration and the country will have to get along without the able Secretary of State, pending the settlement of some important diplomatic matters. It will require most careful nursing to bring Mr. Blaine back to his post of duty, and many of his intimate friends, who fear that he is entirely broken down physically, never expect to see him vigorously at work here again. Ex-Senator Wade Hampton of South Carolina, was in Washtngton to-day. He still clings to Cleveland and thinks he will be the democratic standard bearer in 1982.

The justices of the supreme court of the United States are preparing to go to their circuits for their summer work. It is expected that the nine new circuit courts of appeals will be promptly organized next Monday although President Harrison is not expected to appoint the nine new judges before congress meets again. President Harrison's desk is almost buried under applications and endorsement for these positions.

The secretary of the treasury and the United States treasurer receive many mysterious contributions sent in by unknown persons, whose conscience accuses them of having swindled the government in one way or another. While many people seem to regard the government as they do a corporation, which having neither a soul to be saved or a body to be kicked, may be cheated to any extent justifiably; but now and then an individual turns up who gets worried about his actions. Such penitents usually send the amount they think they owe the government to the secretary or treasurer. Contributions of this sort come in every few days. Some of them are as low as a two cent postage stamp and others are as high as several thousand dollars. Recently a man wrote from Erie, Pennsylvania, saying: "Enclosed find $40, which I return to the government; have beaten HER out of that in minor ways from time to time." Another conscience stricken wretch sent $200 saying: "This is on account of amount I have defrauded the government out of and which I have paid back. Thank God!" A woman in France sent $20 pinned to a note with the words: C'est pour le tresorie" on it. This, no doubt, came from a repentant woman smuggler.

A Grand Location.

Mr. Geo. Guscott, of Grand Forks, spent several days in town the latter part of last and first of this week. Mr. Guscott is a poet whom Whittier has lauded and whose works, though merely in their infancy, bid fair to create a name for him not among the humblest of his class. All poets are of an appreciative nature, and it is no wonder then, that his admiration was so great. Mr. G. visited our dams, rambled along the river banks, saw all the natural advantages and was deeply impressed. He has traveled all over North and South Dakota and the greater part of Minnesota, and says he has not seen many finer spots than this. As to its commercial significance, that was also well understood, and the opinion expressed that with such wonderful advantages it will be simply a miracle it Red Lake Falls does not shortly become one of the important cities of the Northwest. The magnificent water power already developed here is not an iota of what is to come.

The County.

At McIntosh the farmers' alliance met and received bids from farming implement manufacturers for furnishing machinery to the members. The contract was awarded the Plano Co. A reduction of $45 from list price was secured. That would be a good move for every alliance in the county to make.

S. M. Hoff is operating his creamery at St. Hilaire. The difficulty seems to be in securing sufficient cream.

A new church has just been completed in Tabor Township. Nothing points more forcibly to prosperity than such enterprises.

Seth Abbott, father of Emma Abbott, has been about the county appointing agents to canvass for the biography of his lamented daughter. Even after death she proves a source of revenue to him. At his age it would seem more fitting to leave these mediocre errands for others to perform.

Editor Mussey, accept our congratulations over that "seven pound squall," recently added to your household.

A Polk County Farm.

From the East Grand Forks Courier.

One of the prettiest farms in Polk county, if not the prettiest, belongs to Olof M. and John Sandine, on the Marais, in the town of Higdem. It has always been a source of surprise to us that the land department of the Great Northern railway company has not seen fit to publish a cut of this farm in some of its boom literature about farms in the west. At the Sandine home can be seen an ideal farm, and we might add, and truthfully, too, ideal farmers. The house and other buildings are situate some six hundred feet from the main road, surrounded by a lawn of nearly four acres in extent. Back of the buildings is a stream of running water, the Grand Marais, the banks of which are heavily fringed with timber. Just to the north of the buildings, on the banks of the Marais, almost buried from sight in a cluster of trees, can be discerned the steeple of one of the handsomest churches in Polk county—Norwegian Lutheran. In all directions for miles and miles the country is in a high state of cultivation, while on most every quarter of land are substantial buildings—the homes of prosperous farmers. The scene is one well worth a visit, and goes to show what possibilities are in store for this country if man will only do his part.

A THRILLING ADVENTURE.

Curt Wells' experience with a bear hasn't been told to many of the inhabitants of the city and Curt must have a good day's sale at his confectionery store, and be in prime humor before he can be induced to relate an experience which would tax the endurance of a whalebone man. We dropped into Curt's establishment the other day, called for a milk shake (had it charged to advertising) seated ourself in close "proximity" to the peanuts—and watched Curt's copyrighted smile gather on his countenance. "Did I ever tell you," he said, about my experience with a bear about eight years ago? Well, it was along towards evening, the sun had sunk to rest and deep clouds hovered above the horizon. The time of year was autumn when those cold drizzly rains sweep from the north pole. I had purchased twenty yards of canvas with which to make a tent and started home. After crossing the Red Lake river to the north and penetrating the forest about a mile I espied a bear—and being unarmed, I picked up a stick and threw it at his highness with the hope that he would depart to his nook—put to my surprise and inconvenience he started towards me and I started for a poplar tree—the most convenient pro tempore. Up the tree I went, which was too small for bruin to climb. I thought in a short time he would take his departure, but alas, he camped on the ground at the foot of the tree. There was just one small limb on the tree about forty feet from its base. This I was perched upon; the wind raised, the rain and sleet fell in torrents, the tree swayed—at last when I was becoming exhausted I took the canvas and wrapped it around me and then around the tree, thus affording some shelter from the storm and some support to enable me to retain my position which although exhaulted, was rather rediculous and uncomfortable. There I staid—was there even a night longer. The rain came down—I expected every moment that the heavy wind would break the tree and I be hurled to death. It would bend one way and relax the tension on its fiber, when it was strained to its utmost—only to go so much further the other way. Well, there I sat, the white teeth of that black bear beneath awaiting the drop which the canvas prevented. I had a knife but it was too small. What could I do but remain there until daylight—this I did, but by George, when daylight came I was soaked through—benumbed—stiffened—and experienced with a bear

Notes in Corn Growing.

Do not put strawy stable or barnyard manure on light soil for corn. The manure will increase droughty conditions to such an extent that it will do more harm than good unless the season is unusually wet.

If your team crowds together with the cultivator, trampling the corn, tie the out side ring of each bit to the end of a stick four foot long, using a string of such length that the stick will hang just under the jaws. This will draw the horses apart.

If the ground and air dry, compress the soil above the corn; but if the ground is wet and drys slowly, do not compress it. If compression is unavoidable, as it is when the two-horses planter is used, loosen the ground with a smoothing harrow.

The frequency of cultivation should not be measured by days but by condition of soil atmosphere. Cultivation should be often enough to keep the weeds below the surface, to prevent the formation of a crust on the surface, and to keep broken near the surface the continuity of the crevices between the soil particles.—American Agriculturist.

Successful Advertising.

The important effect of advertising is one of a direct nature. It conveys the impression that the party is anxious for business is unavoidably supposed to be an industrious, attentive, civil person who keeps the best of articles at the cheapest rate, does everything in the neatest and most tradesmanlike manner, and in general uses every expedient to gratify and attract customers. People like to purchase under those circumstances, and the system of advertising assuring them that such circumstances exist at this particular shop, they select it accordingly.

Jas. C. O'Brien and Chas Durand came down from Red Lake Monday. J. C. reports Red Lake six inches higher than it has been for three years. Charley says there is a big head of water on Sandy river dam, awaiting the steamboat

In a low white cottage among the trees,
Dorothy lives with her father;
'Midst apple-tree blossoms, and honey bees,
His comfort and pleasure looks after,
Who, returning from toil, of tilling the soil,
Exclaims, as he sees his fair daughter,
Dorothy, dear,
My love, do you hear?
I could not do without you.

Through the grass trips her light-springing feet,
To attend to the birds, and her flowers,
Her supple form bends 'neath the branches sweet,
And the blooms fall upon her in showers,
They seem to say in their own sweet way,
Dorothy dear,
My love, do you hear?
We could not live without you.

The fragrant lilacs down by the gate,
Nod their heads in the soft spring breeze,
While the robin walks on the lawn, and calls to his mate,
In her hidden nest, above in the eaves;
The birds on their perches, 'midst cut-leaf birches;
Swing, and sing, with the fluttering leaves,
To Dorothy, dear,
My love, do you hear?
We could not live without you.

Through the vine-twined hedge, a form she sees,
That is noble, with manly beauty his portion;
With a flush on her cheek like pink sweet peas,
She hides not her girlish emotion.
He clasps her hand, as he repeats again,
Oft uttered words of devotion,
Dorothy, dear,
My love, do you hear?
I cannot live without you.

WITHIN AN ACE.

A THRILLING EXPERIENCE.

Readers, have you ever come within an ace of murdering a man who never did you the slightest harm? If you have you will appreciate the following true store; and if you have not you will, nevertheless, admit that I am justified in speaking of my adventurs as "A Thrilling Experience."

A good many winters ago business had taken me to Milan; and I intended, as soon as I could get away, to push further south, and bask in the sunshine of Genoa or Naples. But "L'homme propose, et Dieu dispose," and thus it came about that, in the midst of my plans, the telegraph brought me a message that matters of extreme importance necessitated my presence in London. Recognising the urgency, I resolved to start at once, but little did I dream how near that resolution would bring me to being a murderer. The great tunnel under the St. Gothard was not then completed, and, in spite of the bitter weather, I decided to cross the Simplon Pass, and go down the Rhone valley to Geneva, where I had an hour or two's business to transact.

When I made known my intention of crossing the Simplon, the landlord of the hotel where I had been staying in Milan warned me against doing any such thing, for the weather, he said, was fearful, and avalanches had been falling for many days. However, I was undeterred; for as an old traveller I knew exactly what credence to give to alarming reports of that kind. And so, packing my traps and paying my bill, I took the afternoon train for Arona, where I would get the diligence for the Pass. Arona, as most people know, is superbly situated at the foot of sweet Lake Maggiore.

In the long summer days it is a scene of constant bustle and confusion. But as I emerged from the little station on that bitter winter evening the place was like the village of the dead. A frozen stillness was over the land, and the steel-blue lake was maddening in its stony placidity. The sky, of a hard blue, was cloudless, and the sun was just disappearing behind the western mountains.

Then suddenly, as if the wand of a magician had passed over the scene, all was changed. Warm, soft coloring glowed where a few minutes before all was colorless. The blue sky flamed with a golden glory that blending into emerald green tinged with crimson where the regal sun had disappeared. This coloring was suggestive of a dream picture, for it was so utterly unlike anything that art can produce, and across the shining waters, all aflush now with a glowing light, floated in rich, mellow cadences the poetic "Angelus," and above it rose from various quarters the musical voices of the workers in the fields and vineyards, as they paused in their labors at the summons of the bells, and solemnly intoned a prayer.

In five minutes more another change had come. The sunlight had entirely gone, the coloring faded. The "Angelus" ceased, the voices were hushed, the lake was like steel once more, and all was cold and dead. Shivering and famished, I took my way to the solitary Albergo, and consoled myself with such barren comfort as it afforded, for I learned that the diligence would not start till midnight.

It had struck twelve when the old, lumbering vehicle rolled out of the court-yard of the diligence office, and went clattering over the roughly paved street of the village. I was the sole passenger, and occupied the coupe. A week before, this very diligence had been attacked and robbed, and amongst other cheerful stories that the people of the Albergo had told me in order to beguile the tedious hours away, was that of a commercial traveller who had been robbed and murdered on the road two years previous.

As I remembered these things I instinctively felt for my revolver, which I invariably carried strapped round my waist on such journeys. As we left the friendly lights of the village behind, and gained the dark, lonely highway which skirts the lake for many miles, I think all the stories that ever I had heard of solitary travellers assaulted and murdered passed through my mind.

The night was intensely cold. The road was frozen into iron, and the stars that shone in the deep blue sky were duplicated in the sleeping lake; while the spectral-looking trees that loomed in the darkness helped to make up a picture that had a Dantesque weirdness about it. Nestling in my rugs, and soothed by the rythmical beat of the horses' feet on the iron road, I fell asleep, but was presently awakened by voices in what seemed to me deep and earnest conversation. The diligence had stopped. I could see nothing, for the glass of the windows was whitened and rendered opaque with the frost.

I tried to let down one of the windows, but diligence travelers will know that I essayed a task that might well have taken the patience of a Job and the strength of a Samson; while to open a diligence door from the inside is a feat that no human being has ever yet accomplished. I therefore had no alternative but to await the unfolding of events. That a plan for robbing me was being discussed between the villainous driver, the conductor, and some bloodthirsty bandits, I had not the slighest doubt, and that my death was a settled question should I offer any resistance was, to my mind, equally sure.

However, I determined to fight hard for my life, and die game if die I must. In a few minutes the door was suddenly opened, and a man sprang in; or rather, as it seemed to me, he was unceremoniously bundled in, and as he sank down at the opposite end of the seat he muttered something that might have been a curse or a greeting. Then I heard the driver and conductor scramble up to their seats, and the heavy vehicle rumbled on again.

"So," thought I, "this is a nice little plot for my robbery and murder; but there will be a fight for it," with which heroic resolution I grasped my revolver with a stern purpose.

My traveling companion was a bandit, a cut-throat of the deepest dye. There could not possibly be any mistake about that, for he might have stood as the model of every Italian bandit who has ever been painted in modern times. He wore a big sombrero, and his muscular frame was enveloped in a great cloak, one end of which was caught up and thrown over his left sholder. His face was perfectly villainous in its expression—of that also there could be no mistake. He had hawk-like eyes and glared at me, while the aroma of garlic that he emitted with his breath was sickening. I don't know whether all bandits reek of garlic, but this one unquestionably did.

Such was the picture my excited imagination drew of my silent companion. The back light that was reflected into the coupe from the diligence lamps enabled me to see him with tolerable distinctness; and feeling sure that robbery, if not murder, was his object, I quietly drew out my revolver from its case, and placing my finger on the trigger and the muzzle on my knee, I waited in anxious suspense for what might follow.

He closed his glaring eyes and pretended to sleep, but I was not to be deceived by any such hollow pretence. I never took my gaze from him. I had let my rugs slip down in order that my movements might be unimpeded when the supreme moment came. The consequence was I was half-frozen. I had no feeling in my legs and feet. My whole body was cramped, while my mental state may be far easier imagined than described.

In a little while my bandit moved. He scrutinized me keenly, of that I was convinced. Then he fumbled under his cloak, and in a few moments I heard a click, and saw the gleam of steel. My heart leapt into my mouth, and my frozen blood instantly thawed. He was about to spring at me and stab me to death. No sane man could have come to any other conclusions. My first impulse was to call out to the driver, but I checked myself, for was not he in collusion with this villain? I was trapped, but I resolved to kill my man before he should kill me. I had him in my power, and would shoot him dead.

I still sat, and still had the revolver on my knee. The muzzle pointed in direct line with the bandit's body. A cold prespiration broke out on my face, and a creepy sensation ran down my spine. He seemed to me to grasp his knife more fiercely, and to be preparing for the spring.

Poor fool! he little dreamed that I held his life at my disposal. I pressed the trigger of the revolver, but not hard enough. Why I did not know, and have never since been able to determine. Another hair's weight more in the pressure, the hammer must have fallen, and the bullet could not possibly have missed going through his body, for we were so close together, and the compartment was so narrow.

"I will let him make the first move." I thought. "The moment he tries to strike I will fire." This determination was the result of a strong reluctance to take life except at the very last resource. Although I felt sure this bandit was a ferocious assassin, thirsting for my life in order that he might possess himself of my valuables, he had not yet given any distinct evidence of what his intentions were, and as I could fire as rapidly as he could strike at me, he should begin the combat.

Moments passed. They seemed minutes, nay, hours. I am not a coward. I say it emphatically. It has been my lot to face death in many forms, but I confess that never before did I experience such an inward shrinking as I did at being cooped up with this dastardly Italian murderer. If he would only have got out onto the open road and have had a fair fight, I would have fought him to the death. But the uncertainty of his intentions, and the fact that he and I were cooped up in a wretched box of about four feet by a foot and a half, and that it was impossible for me to get out, was what made the situation so thrilling and exciting. And it was the suppressed excitement that tried me so.

At last, when my nerves had been strung to such a pitch that I felt as if I must shoot him or go mad, I saw him turn towards me: his villainous knife flashed in the light. I pressed the trigger of the pistol, but still the hammer did not fall. What stopped it I know not, and the next instant the bandit said, in a thick, guttural voice, and speaking in patois;—

"Signor, will you accept of a piece of sausage?"

He had pulled out a huge Bologna sausage from his pocket, and, cutting a slice off, proffered it to me. My heart dropped down into my boots, my blood froze again, my hair stood on end—I felt sick and faint. I took the slice of sausage. Whether I ate it or not I don't know for certain, but I think I bolted it.

In a few minutes the diligence stopped. The driver descended, and opening the door told us we had half an hour to wait while the horses were changed. I sprang out. I seized the driver and dragged him on one side.

"Who is that man?" I asked, hoarsely.

"That, signor? Oh, he's a very worthy and simple-minded farmer. He resides in this village, but you see he's fond of good wine. He's been to Arona to sell two cows, and has had a bottle too much. He started to walk home, and we overtook him. I was afraid he might go to sleep on the road and be frozen to death, so I persuaded him to ride; but he haggled so long about the fare that I was nearly leaving him behind."

My ferocious bandit had gone into the harness-room, where a large wood fire blazed, and he stood before it warming himself. I rushed in after him. I seized his hand and shook it warmly. I offered him my flask; filled with rare old Cognac worth fifteen shillings a bottle. With a deep-throated "Gratia, signor," he nearly emptied it. He looked amazed, as well he might, and opened his mild, calf-like eyes to their fullest extent. He had the softest, sweetest face of any man I ever saw.

It was a face such as the old Italian masters would have loved to paint. But as he looked at me with those dark liquid orbs, he was no doubt thinking to himself. "There is another eccentric Englishman. Truly these Englishmen are hard to understand."

Once more I wrung his hand, uttered a pathetic "Buono dara," and, rushing out, jumped into the diligence, and, with a shudder buried myself in my rugs.

PUT THEIR HEADS TOGETHER,

Clever Scheme of Two Stranded Students to "Raise the Wind."

Last Summer, during the vacation season of their college, two Heidelberg students, Benzel and Stengel, were making a lively, picturesque and carmine-punctuated tour of the various fashionable watering places. The tone of their journey had been so continuously kept up to the highest pitch that it had an effect like that of a sunstroke, when Benzel one morning, said his total available funds were $1.

"And my exchequer is measured by exactly the same sum."

Here was a dilemma.

The next day at a miscellaneous bathing resort a young gentleman was the life of a merry party of ladies and gentlemen. He had just arrived from Berlin, he remarked, and by the strength of an assurance which had often puzzled learned professors who knew most of the mysteries of existence had at once made himself the leader of those who flocked by themselves as the representatives of the moneyed class. His banter, his jokes, his ever-ready wit kept them in continued merriment.

"A note for Mr. Frederick Benzel." So spoke a waiter, handing him an inclosure. Opening it, a shade of half disappointment crossed his handsome face, and excusing himself, he hurriedly left the room.

In a little while he returned, the sad expression on his countenance, if anything, intensified.

"My friends," he began, "there are ups and downs for all of us in this world, but anything sadder than this I know not. An old collegemate, who has met with undeserved misfortune, noting my presence, sent in a message he would like to see me. I saw him an object of the deepest compassion. He lives in the neighborhood, the husband of a widow with thirteen children. Could anything be more unlucky? Will I be seconded if I propose a little collection for the poor fellow? I myself will give $2."

"Good! Good! Certainly!" was the unanimous cry.

That evening at dusk Benzel and Stengel began their return journey with a profusion of ruddy exhilarating that made the red of their oncomon voyage paler than a primrose's heart.

A Canine Swindler.

Here is a good story of a farmer's dog who has been proved guilty of obtaining goods under false pretences.

The dog is extremely fond of sausages, and has been taught by his owner to go after them for himself, carrying a written order in his mouth.

Day after day he appeared at the butcher's shop, bringing his master's order, and by-and-by the butcher became careless about reading the document. Finally, when the bill was sent in the farmer complained that he was charged with more sausages than he had ordered.

The butcher was surprised, and the next time Lion came in with a slip of paper between his teeth he took the trouble to look at it. The paper was blank, and further investigations showed that whenever the dog felt a craving for sausage he looked round for a piece of paper, and trotted off to the butcher's.

The farmer is something out of pocket, but squares the account by boasting of his dog's intelligence.

AMONG THE WOMEN FOLKS.

SUBJECTS THAT WILL BE OF INTEREST TO THE LADIES.

Street Costumes and House Gowns --Traveling Manners--Household Contrivances--A Cloak of Scarlet Broadcloth.

Street Costumes and House Gowns.

A very neat street costume is of dark blue camel's hair serge, Doucet model, trimmed with gray shawl fringe trimming, terra cotta cloth vests with dainty little frog ornaments in blue; full blue sleeve having cuff of terra cotta fringe; skirt plain, introducing red cloth on the side braided with loops of terra cotta, extending up on the hips and down the back, both sides of the fan plaiting. Another elegant visiting dress is of gray Bedford cloth, long polonaise in one piece, trimmed with Alaska sable round the neck, down the front of basque and round the bottom of skirt. Brocade polka dot velvet sleeves, a band of the same on bottom of the skirt below the fur trimming. Two pretty tea-gowns becoming to any style of beauty merit a description. One of old rose cashmere has a surah ruching trimming all around the neck down to the waist, dividing there to fall on either side of the white surah front, and finishing the demi-train sleeve half open bell shape and lined with white surah; Fedora front of white surah edged with gold feather stitching. Little puff on top of sleeve of white blue squares.

House gowns should be opened a little in the neck, the effect being so much more soft and graceful. For those who can stand it they should always retain this mode of dressing the neck, but for the unfortunate long-necked women there is the never-failing "in-filler" of lace, what a multitude of defects it covers, too! It certainly has "carried the day" this winter, for we saw it hobnobbing with cloth, fur and every conceivable material—but prettiest and in best taste does it appear on evening dresses. The flounces worn on low-necked basques are so quaint looking, so suggestive of our grandmother's merry young days. And the old-fashioned plain skirts with a ruching round the bottom! We've seen many a one away up in the garret, stowed off in some corner of an ancient chest of drawers or in a trunk.

Traveling Manners.

Heaven deliver us from the nervous, worrysome, fussy traveler! The one who wants to know how far it is to his or her journey's end; who opens windows, or shuts them, or fancies there is coal smoke that should be let out, or fresh air that should be let in; or who fears the train may run off the track; or that there may be an accident of some sort; or that the train may not arrive in time; or that the expected friends may not be at the station, or what not.

There should be a special car for such inharmonious spirits; some place where they could be closed in and kept from harm to themselves and others. It is this class of persons who want to help the conductor and engineer and the trainmen to run the train, and who wouldn't mind managing [?]—heaven save the mark—the entire business of the railroad. It is, however, a curious fact that such people never seem to have made such brilliant success of their own affairs as would warrant a corporation in turning over its management to them.

It is remarkable how little interest one takes in the concerns of others after having made life a success. Who ever saw a man of acknowledged ability, one who had really achieved something, fidgeting and worrying and nagging because some one's affairs were not progressing satisfactorily—that is, to outsiders like himself.

Never lose sight of the fact that the more comprehensive the mind of a man or woman the less he or she will concern himself or herself with the details of other people's management.

In traveling, of all things there is need for a quiet, settled, mind-your-own-business-and-let-others-mind-theirs spirit. One discontented, "naggy" individual can set a whole car full of well-disposed persons on needles. Quiet manners, inconspicuous dress and unobtrusive good-nature are divine graces in a traveling companion, and do more to render journeying pleasant than the thoughtless and careless could be made to believe.

A Cloak of Scarlet Broadcloth.

She was an uncommonly pretty girl, to be sure, but her beauty would have found fewer admirers in any other cloak. The day was one of those ugly, gray affairs that give the most aggravated symptoms of lagrippe to everyone who has the least imagination or a proper sense of the fitness of things. The steaming fog was taking the kinks out of every other woman's hair, but around the smooth white brow of the girl in the scarlet wrap the little curls grew tighter, the waving tendrils wavier. Neither blonde nor brunette, but with a clear, fair skin, a healthy red in her cheeks, and big brown eyes full of mingled honestry and coquetry, the eyes that belong to the girl, pure, sweet, and true-hearted, in whom has just awakened a delightful perception of her power and a mischievous enjoyment in its exercise. Crowning the curls was an odd little hat of scarlet crepe, petticoated with black lace of delicate tracery. A fan of the lace stood up behind, supported by a little gold serpent erect on the tip of its tail. But the cloak—it was of scarlet broadcloth; a revised Connemara in shape. It flew open at the bottom and showed the lining of scarlet satin. A huge gold cord with heavy tassels edged the yoke and tied in long loops and ends in front. Full gathers made the shoulders very high. The yoke and high collar were braided with gold, and all about the foot of the circular ran a deep gold border spangling in fantastic excursions up toward the waist.

Household Contrivances.

Woman's inventive genius has naturally been largely exercised thus far in devising household contrivances, particularly for the nursery and the kitchen, says the Washington "Star." She has taken out letters patent on a "baby charmer and dental cutter," a "baby walker," several improved sorts of bibs, ditto diapers, a "baby jumper" and baby chairs. Also in her list of new creations are toy skating rinks, musical tops, novel dolls and building blocks. In the ordinary line there are dough kneading machines, a mechanical arrangement for greasing the baking dishes, a smoothing iron that heats itself, a fish scaler, a dish washing contraption and many cooking stoves. Ideas respecting dress are numerously represented, with reference to corsets most of all. The corset seems to bear the same relation as a puzzle to the work of female inventors as does the car coupler to that of the men with fresh thoughts, neither ever seems to be arrived at in a shape that is entirely satisfactory. Of such things as bustles, "dress elevators," obdominal supports and improvements in chemises there is no end. Buttons and studs, as well as fasteners for them, appear to have taxed much feminine ingenuity, nor are such trifles neglected as blacking brushes and blacking boxes, "folding soap dishes" and combined scissors and tape measures.

Plain Women.

If all plain women displayed as much common sense in settling the question of personal appearance as a certain bright New York girl, there would be less repining and more agreeable companions among them.

Her argument and conclusion are both eminently satisfactory. She says that, singly and collectively, each physical defect was taken under consideration, and every legitimate means employed to lessen her homely and enhance her attractive features.

To this matter, time, thought, patience and ingenuity were devoted, and a measure of success was attained. But, after once giving the best of taste and labor to her toilet, the whole subject was promptly dismissed, and she absolutely declined to fret or even think about her looks.

Seeing hundreds of ugly women worrying themselves ill in futile efforts to be beautiful, she avoided that Scylla, and at the same time steered clear of the Charybdis of slovenliness, equally fatal to the plain sisters.

By being unaffected and self-forgetful, and by cultivating small talents to deserve a fair share of admiration, she has made herself a favorite, and rarely is one thrown into contact with this young person without wondering why all ugly women are not equally lovely.

Where Women Get Faddish Ideas.

Half the fads in which women indulge today are due to newspaper writers. When some poor toiling, moiling little newspaper women is grinding out an article for the woman's column of a big Sunday paper and gets stuck for material on her last page of copy, does she tear her hair and say: "No butter shall I have this week to spread my Vienna rolls, because, forsooth, I have not ideas enough to fill up my column?" No! She sits down calmly and writes paragraphs that begin with: "It is the correct thing to——." The more unique and startling the "correct thing" is, the better. Miss Newfad and Mme. Latewhim read it next day and immediately adopt it as their pet fancy, and so the fad that my tired little writer up in her tiny room organized to earn butter with is accepted on the avenue, and becomes the "correct thing" after all. As they say in confidential newspaper coteries. "A good fake is as good as a genuine story any day."

Sneezing One's Teeth Out.

The report of the physician in charge of the Ningpo Missionary Hospital for the past year contains some interesting observations on tooth-drawing in China. Dr. Daly remarks that Chinese teeth are much more easily extracted than those of Europeans. The native dentists are said to possess a wonderful powder, which is rubbed on the gum over the affected tooth; after an interval of about five minutes the patient is told to sneeze, whereupon the tooth falls out. Dr. Daly has offered a reward of $100 to anyone performing the operation in this way in his presence, on condition that he is allowed to choose the tooth and examine the mouth before and afterward. So far no one will consent to perform the operation on these conditions.—New York Medical Record.

SUBJECTS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO THE AGRICULTURIST.

Dry and Wet Fodder--The Care of Cows' Feet--Warmth of Growing Vegetation--Winter Wheat--Birds Pulling Corn.

Dry and Wet Fodder.

An interesting and instructive experiment in feeding swine is reported from Germany. It was formerly believed that the moistening of the food was desirable; and the experiment was undertaken to compare the effects of the same food when given in a dry state and when moistened or made into soup.

The experiment was made with four pigs of the same litter, and continued from November 28, 1889, to March 8, 1890. The food consisted of beets and potatoes in equal amounts, creamery refuse, swill and rye and barley meal. At the beginning about one and a half pounds each of the rye and barley meals were fed per head; later this was increased to two pounds. The pigs were fed three times a day. Two received the grain meals mixed with the other food, which was wet, and two received it seperately, in a dry state, after the wet food had been eaten clean.

The gain in live weight during the period of the experiment was as follows: The two pigs to which the grain was fed dry gained respectively 118 and 115 pounds—a total of 233 pounds; the others gained 100 and 76 pounds—a total of 176 pounds. This shows a difference of 57 pounds in favor of feeding the grain dry. It should be noted, however, that the gain in the two dry fed pigs was nearly equal, while there was a marked difference—no less than 24 pounds—in the gain of the two wet-fed ones. One of the second lot must therefore have been less vigorous and thrifty than its mate. If the same relative gain had been made the difference between the totals of the two lots would have been considerably less—say thirty-six instead of fifty-seven pounds. The lesson taught by the experiment would still have been marked, however. Experience in this country points to a similar conclusion.

The Care of Cows' Feet.

Every dairyman that wishes to prevent his cows from losing flesh, condition and milking power should attend carefully to the soundness of their feet; for they, more than any other domesticated animals, are liable to that painful and injurious disease foul-in-the-feet. The main cause of this disease lies in two facts—first, that cows are cloven footed; second that their habits lead them to wade through mud. When any kind of filth becomes lodged for a time between the hoofs the part becomes inflamed, swells and discharges matter, while a fungoid growth develops at the same time. Steers are not so liable to this disease as cows; for not being so much accustomed to indoor feeding, they have not the same inclination to come home before the proper time, crowd around the gate and convert the ground into a mire. Other causes for this disease are tubercle and a strain in the foot.

Treatment advised when the trouble has come from the filth between the hoofs is that the foot should be washed, poulticed with linseed and afterward dressed with sulphate of copper, carbolic acid or butter of antimony. The foot should be kept clean and the cows indoors to rest. When a strain in the foot is the cause there has probably been an excessive growth of the horny part. The toe nails should therefore be cut with a sharp, fine-toothed saw, while the front of the sole must sometimes be pared as well. When tubercle is the cause the disease is too deeply seated for treatment.

Warmth of Growing Vegetation.

The act of growing implies changes in cellular tissue that always are accompanied by warmth, at least as compared with the freezing point. Hence even tender vegetation often escapes when the thermometer registers below the frost temperature. This is because the thermometer encased in tin is made so as to be susceptible to the slightest changes of heat or cold. Even when frost is deposited on a plant the leaf itself is often not frozen, and will not be unless the frost is thawed out too suddenly. In that case the cold in the crystals of ice goes into what they are in contact with while thawing, just the same as is done by making ice cream by thawing ice around it. If there is much wind and the temperature only just down to the freezing point, buds, blossoms and leaves may be injured on the windward side of the trees, while on the lee side the fruit will escape. This phenomena will probably be witnessed on many trees this year, and it may induce the habit which some trees have now of bearing on each side in alternate years, a valuable habit where there is a single tree of some fruit wanted only for family use. Where snow lies on fruit blossoms it may protect them. The chief danger in such case would be not while the snow remained with the germ of fruit hidden beneath it, but when it thawed. Showering trees with cold water as the temperature began to warm would be most apt to let the snow thaw off with least possible injury to the fruit.

Winter Wheat.

From every part of the country comes reports of the condition of winter wheat. Beginning with last fall and continuing until the present, the season has been very favorable over the whole winter wheat area. Reports to the department of agriculture show that the condition of winter wheat is higher than it has been for nine years. Danger is to be anticipated in some quarters from the Hessian fly, but it is not very serious. Wheat is thrifty, stocky and well stooled out, so that it is in a better condition than usual to withstand the ravages of insect enemies. The flattering prospects for a large crop of wheat are accompanied by conditions that insure good prices. Harvest will find this country with a very low reserve of old wheat on hand, and even if our next crop comes up to its present promises and turns out to be a very large one, it is most likely that it will all be needed and taken at good prices. The present outlook is a very favorable one. A big crop of dollar wheat would lift the farmers of this country out of the slough of despond and place them on the solid road to prosperity. Every line of trade and ever channel of business would also be benefited. The corn area of 1891 will doubtless be a very large one. The present high prices will stimulate production. Too many farmers had to buy dear corn this season, and they will make the greatest effort not to be caught again.—Farm and Fireside.

Birds Pulling Corn.

Blackbirds are often very troublesome about pulling corn when it first breaks ground and until it is too tall for them to handle. They have no fear of the lines around the field that would keep off the cows, and they are too numerous to be shot, and too brave to be afraid of scarecrows, or of a man with a gun when he is more than a gunshot away. Corn they want, corn they will have, and it is the best way to let them have it. A peck of corn scattered around the borders of a ten-acre field, putting the larger part on the edge next the swamp, where they most do congregate, will usually satisfy their appetite while the corn is growing, unless they are very numerous, and they would rather pick it up than pull it from the hill. If one feeding is not enough, give another, as it takes but little more corn and much less labor than it would to replant the field. Do not poison the corn, as the blackbirds, robins and other birds that would eat it are troublesome only a few days in the year, and the farmers' friends, in these days of numerous insect pests, the rest of the time.

Cabbage Worm Remedy.

W. S. S. of Chicago writes: I have thoroughly tried bubach, tar oil water, and everything else I could hear or read of for the cabbage worm and signally failed. I tried collecting the butterfly, but found that would not do, for it cost more than the cabbage is worth. Finally I tried hot water, and this did the business. I have used it three years. Have the water at from 150 to 160° Fahr., and put it on with a common tin sprinkler. I begin it as soon as I find a worm or a hole in the leaf, and seldom have to give the plants more than three doses in the season. The water is hot enough to kill the worm, but does not injure the plant, and it will pass between the leaves while the powder will not. This remedy costs nothing, and its application only the time used in applying it.

Growing a Diversity of Crops.

The expenses of the farm and family go on through all the year. It is almost impossible to make profit unless there is equal continuity in selling. There may be and should be special crops that turnish the bulk of the money received from the farm; but if this is drawn upon by a continual drain not relieved by any new supply, it will be drawn down to nothing. For years southern farmers have depended wholly on their sales of cotton, and though this is one of the most profitable crops grown, it has been impossible for southern planters to keep out of debt until they adopted the northern plan of growing a diversity of crops. —Coleman's Rural World.

Farm Notes.

The vegetable farmer makes more real money than any other.

The garden in proportion to the ground it occupies, pays far better than the farm.

It is impossible to live well without a nice garden, small fruit orchard and strawberry bed.

Our farmers must give more attention to the growing of grass and less attention to grain.

The professional gardner does not need much land but he wants it to be rich and convenient to a good market.

The Canadian government has decided to make a grant of money for the establishment of dairy schools throughout the Dominion.

Dr. Wiley is credited with having discovered a method whereby the production of sugar from sorghum can be doubled. This is important,

Prof. Atwater says: "I have traced the roots of timothy to a depth of two feet four inches, and the clover three feet and two inches in a hard clay soil, suitable for making brick."

Jotham Winrow, in the American Grange Bulletin, says: "The average American farmer is not an ignoramus, he is not uncivilized, he is not a fool, a swindler nor a failure."

To be a thoroughly successful dairyman a man must know how to breed and select good stock. Wherever there is a great variation in the financial reports from different dairymen in the same location the variation comes from difference of brains and energy in the dairymen.

TOUGH AND DUDE,

A Very Rash Bum Gets Put Into an Involuntary Sleep.

Probably one of the most surprised bullies that ever attempted to make of a man now nurses a black eye and a broken nose down on the South Side, where he lives. He was standing in the doorway of a Grand avenue store a few nights since, talking with another tough man, and leering at every man and woman that chanced to pass that way, when under the electric light which bids the weary wayfarer welcome in front of the Plankington house he saw what he was pleased to call a dude coming in their direction, smoking a cigar.

"D'ye see ther dude comin,' Nibsy?" he said to his companion.

"Yes, an' I tink it's a dirty shame dat he is spoiling dat nice cigar when he is only fit to smoke cigarettes."

"Dat's a fact, my boy, an' I'm blamed if I intend to stand it. See?"

"What you going to do about it?"

"Just watch me, an' if I don't have dat cigar inside of a minute, den I'll eat me hat, dat's all.

As the young man drew near, the bully stepped from the door, and approaching the unsuspecting pedestrian, said—:

"Say, me lad, let me take your cigar, will you?"

The young man, thinking that the fellow desired a light, knocked the ashes off his weed, and handed it to the stranger, who, with a smile, placed it between his teeth.

"What do you mean by that?" asked the astonished young fellow as he saw the use his cigar had been put to.

"Oh! dat's all right bub," said the tough man; "dis is a pleasant way dat I have when time hangs heavily on my hands. Run on home now or your mother will be worried, see?"

"Yes, I think that I see," replied the young man, as he stepped up in front of the loafer, "but, strange as it may seem, my mother is not in the habit of getting worried, and there is no occasion of my shortening my stay with you. Besides, I too have a pleasant little way of my own to pass away the time when the same hangs heavily upon my hands. It is something like this—"

In another moment the bully was stretched out on the sidewalk with one eye closed, and when he arose a blow on the bridge of his nose once more laid him out. The young man whom he had sized up as a dude turned out to be one of the crack boxers in the gymnasium, and two blows of his scientific fist had been sufficient to put the tough to sleep.—Ex.

Why do not mothers seek to cultivate all of their little one's capabilities and facilities? Why, for instance, do you teach the child to skillfully use the right hand, and ignore such possibilities for his left? Why do you mourn if the child be naturally "left-handed" and seek to cripple his free use of the unruly member? One would almost suspect it was in the nature of a crime to be ambidextrous, so persistently are children admonished to "Take the needle in your other hand, dear!" "Why will that boy drive nails with that hammer in his left hand?" One constantly hears such lament from the lips of mothers and teachers. Left-handed? And why not? Either-handed, rather, as would always result from equal attention to the muscular use of both hands. In the earlier stages of learning to write, children are apt to complain of their hand "getting tired," from the cramped attitude of the fingers; all this would be obviated by alternate use of the left hand. I know a man who has only his left hand to use, and it is wonderful what dextrous use he puts it to; carpentering, the pruning of his large orchards; in fact, all the multifarious employments of the farm are accomplished with speed and precision. It is only the left-handed greeting that one notices in our neighborly intercourse, and even that does not, after a few times, seem either odd or unusual.—From the Ladies Home Journal.

Interest In Widows.

A pleasing proof of the general interest in widows has just been furnished by the republication in London and Scotland of Police Sergeant Oliver Tims's opinion in the matter which were communicated originally to a Sun reporter. The student policeman then remarked that history was full of evidence of the personal worth of widows, and declared the fact that Charles II, Frederick the Great, Lord Nelson, Napoleon, Disraeli and George Washington had married widows proved alike their own astuteness and the estimable character of widows generally. The notion pleased the English and Scotch editors, and they at once proceeded to lay before their subscribers the eloquent eulogies and convincing argument of the sergeant. It isn't often that what a New York policeman says finds its way into print across the ocean, and Sergeant Tims is delighted by the circumstance.

He modestly says, however, that it was not so much what he said that caught the British editors, or the fact that he said it, "but the perennial, interest that blooming widows possess for all mankind."—New York Sun.

The Highest Taxed Country.

Roumania is the highest taxed country in the world. Every bottle of foreign wine has to pay one franc duty. A case of whiskey came from the London Army and Navy Stores the other day. The transport, tax, stamps and other duties amounted to more than the price of the whisky. There is a tax even on female servants. There is a tax on your doorplate. There is a tax which doctors must pay yearly for the privilege of exercising their profession.

Macaulay as a Speaker,

Men listened to Macaulay with respect, weighed his arguments, reflected on what he had said, were often convinced, sometimes converted; but nowhere did crowds of eager listeners and ardent admirers bend beneath the music of his voice or the lightning glance of his eye. An old friend of mine, recently dead, who had often heard him and remembered him perfectly, assured me, however, that he was a great power fifty years ago, and he believed that his oratorical triumphs hardly received full credit in those days.

Macaulay himself said that one of his chief defects as a public speaker was his extraordinary rapidity of utterance, which spoiled the effect of his words. His speeches resembled carefully-prepared essays, delivered with incredible rapidity and some want of impressiveness, rather than the spontaneous outburst of the orator's full heart. Fluency and great facility in finding the right words are not an unmixed gain to the speaker. Appropriate pauses and emphasis are even more important; otherwise a torrent of words lacks impressiveness. Then the management of the voice counts for very much. A speech that flows on like a rope unwound from a cylinder is not a good one. Again, to be successful a speech must be enlivened with anecdotes or humor; people can always read for solid instruction, but a platform speaker must amuse and please rather than teach.—The Gentleman's Magazine.

APPEARANCES AGAINST HIM.

Dilemma of a Prohibitionist Who Was Escorting Two Inebriates.

One of the ablest of the tutors in a leading New England college was at the same time an uncompromising foe to everything of the character of strong drink.

He not only practiced all the teachings of the prohibition science in his own person, but never allowed an opportunity to pass unused of publicly declaring against intoxicating beverages and general dissipation. Hence his standing in the matter was particularly well known.

His rigidity of views on this subject, however, did not prevent his owing to several little hobbies and a goodness of heart that sometimes had the effect of taking the moral partly out of his precepts.

One of these hobbies was his ardent love of botany, and his gentleness of nature came out in his overlooking and hiding many of the collegians' little faults.

One morning early he was returning from a botanizing excursion, when by the roadside he saw a freshman who was plainly the worse from being out all night. He had evidently tried to make his way to his lodgings, but the effort was too much.

Stipulus, the tutor, roused him and, linking his arm to his own, continued on his way. But what was his surprise, on going some little distance, to meet another student in quite the same condition as the first.

For a moment the inconsistency of him—a stanch teetotaler—playing a part of a rescuing ship to these wrecks of dissipation made him pause, but his heart got the better of it.

Lifting the second fallen one he steadied the pair as well as he could and kept on his way.

This double burden was not easy to navigate, and he was by no means a powerful man their wobbling gradually imparted a like motion to his own steps. And at the very moment when this wave-like movement had, so to speak, reached its climax, on turning a corner he came face to face with several members of the senior class.

The surprise was so great that, not knowing whether they had given him the slightest sign of recognition, he failed to recover himself, or even think of asking assistance until they had disappeared.

Conscious of the purity of his heart and motives, however, he saw his cargo home and then went about his duties at the college, only to find the report meeting him on every hand that that morning he had been seen in such a condition on the public street that it was necessary for two good-natured students to almost break their backs trying to carry him home.

Of course the matter was made plain to the faculty, but while Stipulus is no less a teetotaler than ever, he wouldn't now stoop to pick up a man if he saw him fall out of a balloon.—Philadelphia Times.

Next to being a great poet, is the power of understanding one.

Very few persons have sense enough to despise the praise of a fool.

Good Bye!

This is a sad word when taken leave of the beloved, but when Hostetter's Stomach Bitters enables us to say it to an attack of liver complaint, it is by no means sad, but decidedly jolly. Similarly, if the great tonic alternative relieves from dyspepsia or kidney trouble we experience joy. Malaria, rheumatism and neuralgia are also tenants which this remedy dispossesses.

Truly fine nature dislike finery, but coarse ones may dislike both firmness and finery.

"German Syrup"

Martinsville, N.J., Methodist Parsonage. "My acquaintance with your remedy, Boschee's German Syrup, was made about fourteen years ago, when I contracted a Cold which resulted in a Hoarseness and a Cough which disabled me from filling my pulpit for a number of Sabbaths. After trying a Physician, without obtaining relief—I cannot say now what remedy he prescribed —I saw the advertisement of your remedy and obtained a bottle. I received such quick and permanent help from it that whenever we have had Throat or Bronchial troubles since in our family, Boschee's German Syrup has been our favorite remedy and always with favorable results. I have never hesitated to report my experience of its use to others when I have found them troubled in like manner." REV. W. H. HAGGARTY, of the Newark, New Jersey, M.E. Conference, April 25, '90.

CONSUMPTION

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

The wealthy democrats hold Cleveland's silver views.

Harrison's organ's tune to Blaine makes countless thousands dance—with rage.

The rumblings of Cleveland's silver speech are heard in the West. Speech isn't silver with him.

It is doubtful if the middle and poorer classes of the democracy will endorse Mr. Cleveland's silver doctrine.

The leaders of the third party in Polk county political ex-office-seeking soreheads are working hard to organize the third party. Will the farmers be hoodwinked?

That this is a free country becomes more evident every day—protection has tought the American farmer and laborer that if he hasn't any socks he is at perfect liberty to go barefoot.

If onehalf the money paid for gathering the census statistics was devoted to paying an increased clerical force in the land and some other departments at Washington the people would be better satisfied.

We believe the farmers, having the required number of votes, can by unity turn their delegates into democratic conventions and more readily derive benefit from this action than by organizing a third party.

The presumption of a little one horse town like Crookston sending a team to Winnipeg to play base ball is in strict conformity with the average Crookstonite's cheek. They better play St. Hilaire, Fertile or Badger Creek before looking for "bigger game."

The protective portion of the resolutions at the Cincinnati convention clearly demonstrates Donnelly's sympathies and enables the casual observer to decide which party pays his salary as general superintendent of smashups in the third party line.

There are 5,984 vessels on the Great Lakes, the commercial valuation of which is $48,809,650. Mennesota furnishes a vast amount of the freight but development of the northern part of the the state will in a few years more than double the present amount of shipments.

A nauseating publication, "Willmons Express," edited and published monthly by Ada Willmans Powers, reaches our exchange table. A national law to eradicate the spreading pest of mental science humbug would be a benefit to humanity and save many lives. Such publications as the above should be confiscated and destroyed.

In a Dilemma.

Exigencies are arising—dark shadows appearing; mysterious doubts are filling the minds of the third party men as they behold the undivided views of the delegates who composed that crack-brained conglomeration of diversified opinions and unconstitutional reforms which were embodied in the sentimental resolutions of our own air monster Donnelly. When Donnelly soared over that committee and let drop some of his modern fire of political reform the other members of the committee believed themselves struck by a salvation meteor and readily acquiesced in whatever the modern political judas transcribed. We say transcribed because whatever good there be in the platform of the people's party is taken from either of the old parties and whatever bad has been borrowed from some of the parties long since extinct. Peffer, no doubt, was bought by protectionists before he entered the convention and either of the old parties have secured the valuable services of Simpson. Donnelly from his work in the last legislature has proven himself everywhere except working for the interests of the alliance. These three men were the leading spirits in the convention and to-day hold an important place in the ranks of the people's party. It is no idle acquisition to charge that each of the above-mentioned men have sold themselves and will ultimately sell the party to the highest bidder. This is an early date in its history to have such corruption existing—it clearly shows that these leaders of the people have carried their sins down and they will fall with crushing effect even upon the members of the third party. Will the farmers of Minnesota—with all their hopes—follow such corruption? Their votes will be sought by the old parties and any reasonable concessions in the way of constitutional legislation will be assured. Cannot these evils be remedied more quickly this way than by attaching themselves to the mythical effervescent ideas set forth in the resolutions recently adopted at the Cincinnati convention?

The much talked of alliance store which has been under organization ever since the victory of last fall, has terminated in a disrupture of the company. Many of the wisest and best farmers have withdrawn and it is impossible now to procure the required capitol. From the time the company was first incorporated the News believed it to be an unwise scheme and through these columns we have given reasons why the movement from the start would not be a success. When eighteen pounds of sugar are sold for $1.00 and every pound costs 5½c and every other article handled by the retail merchants is sold at a small percentage above cost is there not good reason for commending the action of those who withdrew from the Alliance mercantile origінazation? There isn't millions in it nor thousands and it requires hard labor, close atteation to business and no small amount of ability to work a success of aretail store. Such an orginazation as the one contemplated would be nothing more than a combination working against individuals who have labored long and patiently to build up a trade and many times strained their own financial resources in order to accommodate the men whose trade was saught by the combined. We are glad the stock company is busted; may it requescat inpace.

Satan's Invention of Dyspepsia.

By those who know whereof they speak it is admitted that of all the maladies wherewith man is afflicted there is none more grievous in its torments than dyspepsia, and a right marvelous characteristic of this affliction is that with all its malice it seldom wholly destroys its victim. Dyspepsia very often incapacitates a man for endeavor, and it sometimes extinguishes the fire of ambition within him, but it is the diabolical pleasure of this disease not to deprive its miserable prey altogether of life, and so we see dyspeptics crawling aimlessly about the world, too sick to live as they should live, yet not quite sick enough to die. The lot of these creatures is wretched indeed.

Dyspepsia is the oldest malady known to mankind. The oldest piece of literature—and perhaps the most remarkable poem ever written—treats of the career of a dyspeptic, his physical and mental symptoms, his curious hallucinations, his reformatory life, his gradual restoration to health, his subsequent prosperity and his wonderous longevity. We refer to the book of Job, to the reading—nay, the study of which we urge those who are aware that they have stomachs, and those also who are likely to become so aware. The first important lesson which this beautiful poem teaches is that Satan invented dyspepsia. The archfiend makes his boast that it is in his power to win Job from godliness by afflicting him sorely in body; divinity permits the trial to be made, but insists that the victim shall not be killed. So Satan invents dyspepsia, as we shall—or rather as the poem itself doth—prove.—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

Woman and Her Watch.

When a woman becomes distinguished for executive ability, and through her talent and enterprise competes successfully with the stronger sex, it is rather delightful to see a delicious little bit of feminine inconsequence betraying itself—as it is sure to do—once in a while. One of the cleverest women in New York took her watch to the jeweler's the other day to be mended. "I cannot imagine what is the matter with it," she said to the clerk rather plaintively. "I have been very careful of it ever since you sent it home, and it has not had a jar or shock of any kind"—and turning to the lady who was with her, while the man was examining it—"it is such a nuisance for a busy woman like me to be without a watch.

"I have missed two engagements this week simply because I had no timepiece. I shook it," she went on to the jeweler, "and even warmed it by the fire, but it wouldn't go." The man, with a perfectly grave face but with laughter in his eyes, said, "Perhaps, madam, you did not try winding it," and handed the watch back to her ticking with steady regularity.

"You don't mean to say that was all that was the matter with it!" said the astonished owner. "That was all, madam," answered the clerk, with ever so slight a smile.—New York Tribune.

Selling Peacocks and Dogs.

A street fakir selling peacocks on Broadway said: "These birds come from Ohio. What are they worth? I'll sell them to you for $25 a pair. My pard here has the female and this is the male, a lovely specimen, as you see. Why do we bring them along Broadway? Because the swells and your fine ladies would not see them anywhere else. We work Broadway from Fourteenth to Thirtieth street. The trouble is we draw such crowds that the police won't let us stand long in one place at a time. It blocks up the sidewalk, you see.

"Yes; sometimes I sell dogs. I sold fancy dogs in London and in Paris. There ain't no place like America for one of us. Dead loads of pups are sold on the streets here every year. People who won't go to dog fanciers are often struck with the dog mania when they are confronted with the live article on the street corner. That's where we catch 'em on dogs. That's where I've been catching 'em on peacocks. We are going to run elephants next."—New York Herald.

Learned a Language in 24 Hours.

Of Cardinal Mezzofanti, who could speak fifty-six dialects and languages, it is related that while he was at the Vatican a traveler arrived in Rome from Asia to be confessed whose language no one who met him could understand. Cardinal Mezzofanti was sent for, and found that even he had never heard it spoken. By means of signs he learned the stranger's errand, and that he had with him a dictionary of his native tongue.

This the cardinal took, and informing the pope that he would be prepared in twenty-four hours to confess the man, retired to his room. When at the end of the time named he appeared and announced that he was ready to proceed, it was found that he had mastered the language sufficiently to converse quite freely with the traveler.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Why Big Men Have Little Wives.

There is a very general and ancient impression that big men in choosing wives prefer small women. At first glance this would appear to be true, because the number of big men with little wives is certainly in an overwhelming majority, as we see them. In the five years I have held my office I have learned a thing or two through the medium of the marriage license office, and it is my impression that it is not that big men prefer little women, but that little women prefer big men, and it is the experience of the worldwise that what a woman wants and starts out to get she generally captures.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Child's Imagination.

It is not difficult to turn a child's attention in any direction, and he quickly catches the spirit of those around him. If his imagination is quickened and strengthened by frequent representations of the feelings, thoughts and conditions of others, his sympathies will be constantly aroused, and his impulses will become kind and generous. If, however, he is suffered to grow up without these delicate perceptions, who can wonder that his sympathies are dull, his benevolent impulses weak, and that, instead of developing into a noble and generous manhood, he sinks into a stolid and unimaginative self absorption?—New York Ledger.

The Creations of Thought.

(First correct publication.)

Winged messenger, the human thought,
What vast creations has thou wrought,
All forms and shapes of every kind
The prolific offsprings of thy mind.
The present, future, and the past
Are all within thy mighty grasp.
Time and space to thee unknown—
The boundless universe thine own.
The realms of earth and air and sea
Have opened to thy minstrelsy.

Mountains and rivers, vale and dell,
Have breathed the music of thy spell;
The temple's fane and the city's din,
The gentle zephyr and the bubbling spring
Have all their homage to thee brought,
Mighty, restless, human thought!
The fertile planes and fragrant flower
Have felt the magic of thy power;
The solid rocks and desert sands
Have sprung to life at thy commands.

From the cataract's roar to the whispering shell,
From the mountain's peak to the lowly dell,
From mammoth forms to infinitesimal life,
From earth's lowest depths to its greatest height
We trace thy presence and see thy power,
Making nature blossom like a flower
With similitudes and lessons, fraught
With noblest aims of purest thought;
Lifting our beings from material sense
To thoughts of man's omnipotence.

The sea, the sea, the restless sea,
What fitting emblem, oh thought of thee!
Surging and dashing at its confines,
Like restless thoughts in human minds;
Welling and swelling to scan that shore
From whence travellers return no more;
Seeking to extend thy mighty space
Beyond the limits of thine embrace,
To conquests new and discoveries grand,
Beyond the bounds of thy commands.

Thy presence on the ocean's breast
Hath mirrored forth its deep recess,
And in her very heart doth thrill
The throbbing message of thy will,
Subverting time and space and sea
To serve thy regal sovereignty.
Pulsing old Neptune's realm with life,
With heralds of commerce, peace or strife;
Bearing on its bosom, and in its heart,
The varied products of thy mart.

Where'er we look on nature's face
We may thy wondrous image trace
In lessons of wisdom, truths sublime;
Stamped with the impress of thy mind,
Infusing thy life in rocks and stones
Like the Spirit's breath on the valley's bones;
Voiced with a power that lifts the soul
Out of its husk of nature's mould,
To the very gates of heaven it sings,
Born on its rainbow colored wings.

And when we look within thy soul
And try to measure thy control
What visions open to our sight,
What beings hover in thy light!
Visions unutterably sweet and grand
Come rushing forth at thy command.
With recognitions ineffably bright,
Effulgent with ethereal light,
Bearing the olive branch like Noah's dove,
Teaching lessons of Faith and Hope and Love.

Oh mighty thought, when once unbar'd
Like the caged bird from its prison bars,
Shall mount to azure heights unknown,
To the very presence of God's throne,
And claim with omnipotent deity
Thy kindred nature and affinity,
And contemplate for ever more,
The heights and depths to explore;
In boundless space and boundless time,
With boundless powers of boundless mind.

The Chronic Kicker.

The poet says: "What is more perfect than a day in June?" And nowhere the world are June days so perfect as in the great Northwest. And yet for some inscruable purpose, Providence permits the Chronic Kicker to infest even June days. You have seen the "Kicker" haven't you? Of no particular sex or age, "he, she, or it" is omnipresent, always awake and on the lookout for something to growl about. The genus is divid d into several species, the political Kicker, the financial Kicker, the religous Kicker, the socal Kikcer, and so on, ADINFINITUM. Don't you wish you could escape it? Well, you can't but there is one place where you will find less of him, her, etc., than anywhere else and that is on the luxurious vestibuled trains of "The Burlington" running between Minneapolis and St. Paul and Chicago and St. Louis. To get as far away from the Kicker as possibly insist on your ticket agent selling you a ticket over "The Burlington." For any further information about the line, rates, etc., address W. J. C. ERI'S BURGLARS.

Farmer Stebbins and His Wife Got a Terrible Scare from Strangers.

Farmer Eri Stebbins, fast asleep after his hard day's work in the field, was suddenly roused to semi-consciousness by a loud crash. Just what or where the noise was did not appear, and, after a little vain listening for further disturbance, the tired farmer sank again into slumber. A moment later he was once more roused—this time most thoroughly so—by his wife's voice whispering hoarsely in his ear: "Eri! Eri! wake up! There's somebody down suller trampin' round! Don't you hear um?"

Eri did hear some one moving somewhere in the lower part of the house, and he instantly slid out of bed ready to do battle. "Somebody in the cellar! He'd show 'em a thing or two worth remembering." With these warlike thoughts flashing through his mind the farmer slipped on his trousers and stole softly down stairs to the kitchen.

The noise in the cellar sounded very loud now, but not at all like tramping; rather it was a combination of scuffling and scratching with a queer slopping sound, as of some one paddling in water.

Eri was taking down his loaded gun from its hooks on the wall just as another crash sounded through the house. This time the sound was unmistakable; a pan of milk had been knocked from the table to the stone floor. The angry farmer cocked his gun, hurried to the cellar door, threw it open and then—stopped short.

The bright moonlight streaming in at the outside door of the cellar showed five or six half grown pigs making a feast of the milk, which was streaming over the floor.

Eri at once understood the situation. The pigs, which were pastured in the orchard about the house, had found their way to the outer door, pushed it open and entered the cellar. The only thing to do was to drive them out.

So, putting his gun back on the hooks, Eri started to eject the intruders.

Now if any one terrestrial quadruped is harder to drive than all others, that quadruped is a pig. However, as the farmer was experienced in pig driving and thoroughly in earnest, he soon got rid of all except one brute that steadfastly refused to go. He would charge full toward the open door, but when within a few feet of it would suddenly dart aside and rush back to the farthest corner of the cellar. When routed from this lurking place he would repeat his former maneuver with just enough variation to render impossible any attempt to stop him.

After three or four such experiences Eri began to get excited. He would have beaten the pig, but he had no weapon of any sort. At last, however, he got near the brute and, raising his foot, kicked him heavily in the rear. Alas for Eri! he had quite forgotten that he was barefooted.

As a result he nearly broke all the toes of his right foot. The kick, moreover, frightened the poor pig so badly that he suddenly made a bolt up the stairs toward the kitchen.

Now it happened that Dame Stebbins, armed with an old boot and carrying a tallow candle, was just coming to her husband's assistance. There was a fine combination of screams, squeaks and grunts, followed by several heavy bumps, as the the woman and pig rolled together down the stairs and into the puddle of milk below.

At this ludicrous sight Eri burst into laughter, whereupon his indignant spouse soundly berated him for his hardness of heart, declaring that he would laugh if she were to break her neck.

While the farmer was pacifying his angry wife prudent piggy slipped quietly out of the door and made good his escape.—Youth's Companion.

Ought to But Couldn't.

"Do you make keys here?" asked the woman as she entered a locksmith shop.

"Yes'm."

"Well, I want one."

"What sort of a key, ma'am.

"One for the front door."

"Have you a duplicate?"

"No."

"Bring the lock?"

"No."

"What sort of a key is it?"

"I—I don't remember."

"But how am I to guess? There are about 40,000 different kinds of keys."

"H'm. I didn't know that."

"Is it a night key?"

"Yes, yes. That's it. It's a night key."

"But that's also very indefinite."

"Well, my husband sometimes unlocks the door with his pocketknife or buttonhook or anything else that comes handy, and you ought to know about what sort of a key would fit such a lock."

He studied over it a while, but finally had to admit that he was up a tree.—Detroit Free Press.

Take Time.

Take time. It is of no use to fume or fret or do as the angry housekeeper who has got hold of the wrong key and pushes, shakes and rattles it about the lock until both are broken and the door is still unlocked. The chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures.

Try to regard present vexations as you will regard them a month hence. Since we cannot get what we like, let us like what we can get. It is not riches, it is not poverty, it is human nature that is the trouble. The world is like a looking glass. Laugh at it and it laughs back; frown at it and it frowns back. Angry thoughts canker the mind and dispose it to the worst temper in the world—that of fixed malice and revenge. It is while in this temper that most men become criminals.

He Didn't Like to Walk.

A clever French comedian when a young and struggling actor in Paris hit on an ingenious plan to save himself the walk from the theater after rehearsal to his lodgings, which were situated near Montmartre cemetery. He dressed in black, and if he espied a funeral procession with a vacant seat in any one of the coaches he promptly pulled out a handkerchief and hid his face in it while hailing the vehicle. Under the impression that he was one of the mourners arrived late he was of course immediately installed in the vacant seat.—London Tit-Bits.

An Ancient Indian Art.

Southern India has been the cradle of the art of copper engraving, and seems likely soon to become its grave, for barely half a dozen artisans still exist who understand the subtleties of the old craft. Till quite lately copper chombras with brass or silver ornamentations used to be manufactured in Tanjore, Arkonum, and are still drawing their last breath at Manambuchavadi and Tirupati, but the cunning has gone from the hand, and the work is less powerful than the ancient one.—Nineteenth Century.

That story from Algiers about the locusts eating a scientist, boots and all, leaving nothing but his bones and a necktie, is causing a great deal of curious comment. Regarding their discriminating rejection of the tie it is probable that, the scientist being a young man and a Frenchman, the tie was so loud that it scared the voracious insects away.

Russia has given an order for 3,000,000 new rifles to be made in France, which is an indication of present peace and ultimate war. It will take some time to make that many rifles and distribute them to the troops, and it would hardly be worth while to leave such an order if the general war was to be inaugurated before the order had been fulfilled.

Upon being introduced to Ulysses S. Grant, Jr., the other evening, Chinese Minister Tsui said to him: "You are the son of the great Gallant, and your place is in China, where the Government would do everything for you, because they loved your father." The Chinese word for the name Grant, it seems, is one that is pronounced "Gallant," which is singularly appropriate in this instance.

WILL LOSE HIS HEAD

Tcheng-Ki-Tong, Formerly Connected With London and Paris Legations Sentenced to Death.

His Propensity for Swindling While in Paris the Probable Cause of the Sentence.

PARIS, June 3.—Advices received from Peking state that Tcheng-Ki-Tong, who was acting first secretary of the Chinese legation in London and in this city, has been condemned to death.

It is believed here that this sentence is the outcome of the diplomat's action while in this country. Tcheng-Ki-Tong had for six years acted as secretary of legation here and in London, and his life in this city, where he spent the greater portion of his time, was marked with many forms of extravagance.

During the early part of this year the London Times published a dispatch coming ostensibly from Li Hung Chang, the Chinese prime minister, authorizing Tcheng Ki Tong to negotiate for his government a loan of £7,000,000. Tcheng Ki Tong opened negotiations with two banks in London and a bank in Paris to furnish the loan.

While the negotiations were in progress Tcheng Ki Tong was recalled, and he afterward sailed from Marseilles to China to the great sorrow of a number of creditors whom he owed large sums. In fact, it was generally believed that the Chinese diplomat had taken advantage of his official position to swindle right and left. Some of his dupes would probably have had him arrested if such a course had been possible, but representing as he did the emperor of China he was free to pursue his swindling schemes with no fear of the French law before him, his position exempting him from the process of law.

But Chinese law is far reaching where the subjects of the emperor are concerned, and when Tcheng-Ki-Tong was recalled, owing, no doubt, to reports of his conduct here reaching the Chinese authorities, there was no course open to him but to obey the emperor's mandate. Had he not done so his family in China would have been held responsible for his acts, and all his relatives would have been held to a strict accountability for the deeds of their kinsman. Rather than bring this disaster upon his relatives, Tcheng-Ki-Tong obeyed his sovereign's command to return to his native country.

Immediately upon his arrival there he was placed under arrest. His trial shortly followed, and death is the penalty for his wrong doing.

HOW WILL IT RESULT?

The Outcome of the Shindy Between Finley and the Alton Uncertain.

CHICAGO, June 3.—What will be the outcome of the dispute caused by Chairman Finley's decision against the Chicago & Alton railroad is just now the all-absorbing question in Western passenger circles.

The situation is regarded as decidedly critical when viewed in the light of General Manager Chappell's emphatic announcement that the Alton will not pay $1 of the fine imposed by Mr. Finley. There is no reason to suppose that the chairman will recede from his position. He has executed the agreement presumably according to his best judgment, and it remains with the association to say whether he shall be sustained or not.

If Chairman Finley's judgment is confirmed and the Alton still refuses to pay the fine the association will probably go to pieces. In consequence of this state o affairs more than usual interest is felt in the regular monthly meeting of the association which begins to-morrow. The only way the Alton can be forced out of the association is by all the other roads withdrawing and organizing anew without the Alton. But it is doubtful if anybody really believes that this will be the result. The other roads know too well that a Western passenger association, with the Alton on the outside and inclined to make trouble, will be short lived.

The opinion seems to be general that a rate war is to be avoided above all things, and, although it will be a bitter pill for some of the competitors of the Alton to swallow, it is not improbable that they will choose the easiest way to keep out of trouble and decline to confirm Chairman Finley's ruling.

She Wanted a Nice Picture.

Boston Traveller: A local photographer tells a story of a young man who came into the studio one day and asked nervously if he might have a little conversation with him.

The visitor was painfully ugly, and, after some awkward blushing and indefinite allusions, he asked the artist if he supposed he had among his samples a picture of any young man who looked like him, but was better looking.

"What do you mean, young man?" asked the photographer.

"Well," replied he, making a clean breast of it, "I am just engaged to be married. The young lady lives out West. She is going home to-morrow. She says she thinks I am so good she doesn't mind my being homely, but she wants a good-looking picture to take home with her to show the girls."

Ten Had a Walkover.

CHICAGO, June 3.—Although eleven circuit judges were to be elected in Chicago to-day, each for a term of six years, there was practically no contest except for the eleventh place, where five Republican and Democratic judges who were candidates for re-election had a complete walkaway. The eleventh judgeship was captured by Francis Adams, the candidate of the Carter Harrison Democracy, endorsed by the Republicans. The straight Democrats, in putting up a full ticket of eleven judges, simply scattered strength. Judicial elections were held also at other places throughout the state. Jacksonville and Jerseyville went Democratic. Kirkwood was carried by the Republicans.

CHICAGO, June 3.—The shipments of flour, grain and provisions from Chicago to the seaboard by the lines in the Central Traffic association last week aggregated 14,982 tons, against 13,986 for the week previous, an increase of 996 tons, and against 28,337 for the corresponding week last year, a decrease of 13,355 tons. Lee's scheme for a reunion of the soldiers of the North and South was discussed, and it was decided to make no special features of such a reunion. Soldiers wearing either the blue or the gray will be welcomed and well treated.

HE STILL LIVES.

Sir John Macdonald's Life Hanging by a Slender Thread.

OTTAWA, Ont., June 3.—The premier passed the day marked by periods of depression. He took a small amount of nourishment. Consciousness remains much the same as in the past two days. He suffers no pain. There is every prospect that he will live through the night. The heart's action is becoming more feeble, indicating that life's fires are burning very low.

To-day saw no cessation of the rush towards Earnscliffe. At the approaches on Sussex street a long line of vehicles blocked the roadway and the curious throng, including many ladies, passed up to the very gates in their anxiety to learn the latest news.

The question of the leadership is being anxiously discussed. The general opinion is that Sir John Thompson will be the next premier, although a majority of the Western members favor Sir Charles Tupper. The French Conservatives are almost a unit for Sir John Thompson, and may insist upon his appointment. The matter, to a very considerable degree, rests with the governor-general, who, it is stated, learned the premier's wishes during the election campaign. Sir Charles Tupper, at that time, was his choice. Hon. J. J. C. Abbott is also stongly spoken of.

SIR JOHN'S SUCCESSOR.

TORONTO, Ont., June 3—Discussing the question of what will follow in the event of Sir John Macdonald's demise, the Globe, the provincial organ of the Liberal party, says:

"Hints have been thrown out about a coalition, but that is out of the question. The Liberals would not coalesce with Sir Charles Tupper or Sir Hector Langevin upon any terms, nor join with Abbott or Sir John Thompson, except upon a clear understanding that the national policy should be abandoned in favor of free trade with the United States. The Tory party would scarcely care to see itself effaced in that manner.

"Whoever Sir John's successor may be, the task before him is one of extraordinary difficulty. With Sir John it was always after me the deluge, and Mr. Blake has just shown how gravely our future is compromised. The Liberal are prepared, putting public considerations first, to do everything that is fair and reasonable to enable the queen's government to be called on, but they cannot be expected to condone things which they have condemned or to support a financial policy which they know to be wrong."

BAD EFFECT UPON BUSINESS.

MONTREAL, June 3.—Sir John Macdonald's illness and the possible political complications that may ensue in the Canadian premier's death, is having a marked effect on stocks, and the Montreal market to-day was very weak and panicky, bank stocks and general stocks all showing a weak tendency. The general feeling on the street is that on Sir John's death there will be a sudden break in stocks, and the feeling is an uneasy one.

BAD BANKING.

Testimony Showing Criminal Management of a Philadelphia Bank.

PHILADELPHIA, June 3.—Francis W. Kennedy, president of the suspended Spring Garden National bank, was arraigned to-day before United States Commissioner Bell, charged with making false returns to the controller of the currency, making false entries in the bank's books and with the embezzlement of $100,000 and upward of the bank's funds. Henry H. Kennedy, cashier of the bank, was also arraigned with his brother, charged with conspiracy with him and being guilty himself of the first two charges of the indictment.

In addition to the charges brought against them by the federal authorities, the Kennedys are under $10,000 bail each to answer in the state court to the charge of receiving money at a time they knew the bank was insolvent.

Bank Examiner Drew, who testified to his taking charge of the bank at the request of President Kennedy. Witness asked Mr. Kennedy if there was anything crooked in the management of the bank, and was told by Mr. Kennedy that there was. He found in the cash drawer checks of President Kennedy drawn on the Spring Garden bank to the amount of $70,000 and other papers that raised the sum total to about $100,000. President Kennedy's account was shown by the books to be overdrawn $10,587.

Harry E. Turner, paying teller, identified the checks of President Kennedy that he had been carrying as cash. These checks were carried by order of president Kennedy. On Feb. 9, the day previous to the visit of the bank examiner by order of the president, he transferred $30,000 of the "carrys" he had in his drawer to loans and discounts, and $41,000 of it to F. W. Kennedy's account. By this arrangement a cash balance of $51,000 was shown instead of $70,000. After the departure of the bank examiner the "carrys" were gradually increased to the amount they were

WHEN THE BANK FAILED.

Samuel A. McClure, assistant cashier, testified that he kept the stock ledger, and on Feb. 9 he discovered an over issue of 200 shares of stock. He spoke to President Kennedy about it, and was told that he should have the certificates the next day. The next day the bank examiner visited the bank and witness, relying on the promise of President Kennedy to give him the certificates of over-issued stock, took a trial balance by charging the over-issued stock to the account of a depositor and F. W. Kennedy.

Samuel R. Shute, a clerk, testified that on Feb. 11, last, he was keeping the individual ledger account. W. W. Kennedy's account at the time was overdrawn to the amount of $51,000 and the entry so showed in the book. The bank examiner was at the time examining the bank, but before he arrived at witness' book Cashier Henry H. Kennedy came to where he was working and altered the date to the day preceding and then brought him some deposit slips for about $60,000. These slips witness entered to the credit of F. W. Kennedy, thereby making it appear that the bank owed Kennedy about $10,000. Several other clerks of the bank also testified that Directors Young and Evans owed the bank respectively about $75,000 and $290,000, and that President Kennedy owes in the neighborhood of $891,000.

President Kennedy's bail was fixed at $20,000 and Cashier Henry H. Kennedy's at $15,000. Bail was entered for Henry H. Kennedy at once.

A New Cruiser.

WASHINGTON, June 3.—Proposals were opened at the navy department to-day for the construction of the protected cruiser No. 13, provision for which was made by the last congress. The vessel is designed to make, in an emergency, the extraordinary speed of twenty-two knots an hour, which would enable her to capture the swiftest of the ocean greyhounds, or to escape from the pursuit of any more formidable craft. The bids were as follows: Will Cramp & Sons of Philadelphia, $2,745,000; Union Iron works of San Francisco, $2,793,000; Bath Iron works of Bath, Me., $2,690,000.

THE CHASE OF LIFE.

All men are hunters. Salesmen hunt for fame;
The doctor hunts for fortune and a name;
The merchant hunts for store of gathered gold;
For glory's garland hunts the warrior bold;
The lawyer hunts for clients and for fees;
But there's a hunt that's keener yet than these—
'Tis when the lover tries his utmost art
To hunt and capture some fair maiden's heart.

BLIND.

All Paris was oppressed by that overpowering heat which often precedes a July storm. Low rumblings of thunder, like the distant roaring of a lion in the desert, kept coming nearer until the storm-clouds broke with the sharp, crashing noise of splitting planks.

The next minute large rain-drops began to pelt the faces of the passers, and to speckle with gray spots the dusty granite of the sidewalks.

A pretty brunette, about twenty years old, over-taken by the unexpected shower, hastened to seek refuge in a hospitable doorway.

Her clothing was not such as could be very seriously injured by the inclement weather; indeed, her attire was extremely simple, and indicative of the strictest possible economy. A plain dress of black merino, well fitted and tastefully made, and a straw hat trimmed with poppies, showed her to be one of those little sewing girls whose honest poverty obliges them to make their own clothes. Martha Duflou—such was the young girl's name—was a pink of neatness from her bare white hands to her carefully polished low shoes.

It was only ten o'clock at night, and the street was almost deserted. A young man came hurrying along, and although he had an umbrella he ran for shelter from the rain to the doorway where Martha stood. He was so absorbed in watching the progress of the thunderstorm that he had hardly noticed the girl when a dazzling flash of lightning, followed immediately by a terrible peal of thunder, illuminated the street and at the same instant a shrill cry rang through the air.

"Merciful Heaven!" exclaimed the young girl, "I cannot see—it is all dark—the lightning has burnt my eyes—I am blind!"

Instances of this kind, though comparatively rare, are by no means unknown in the history of medicine; sudden blindness caused by a stroke of lightning is sometimes curable, but when it results from paralysis of the optic nerve there is but little chance of recovery.

A flood of tears followed the sighs and moans of the terrified girl as she reflected that she could no longer earn her living. She could not even find her way home without help. What was to become of her? Must she beg her bread?

Bertrand Camusard was a young clerk, and being accustomed to the dissipations of Paris, was ever on the watch for a trick. When, therefore, the young girl bemoaned her fate, he looked at her curiously. Her face was not in the least disfigured, The large dark eyes shone brilliantly, a slight flush relieved the whiteness of her skin, and her features were small and regular. She was very pretty, he found,

"Is there no one to help me?" she said piteously, extending her hand.

"Do not cry, mademoiselle," answered Bertrand, in a soothing tone, "I will take you home as if I were your dog."

"Oh, thank you, sir."

"Where do you live?"

"At No. 126, Lacondamine Street."

"That is close to my house," said Bertrand to himself, then he added aloud, "The rain has stopped, will you take my arm?"

As they walked the young man looked at his fair charge in surprise; if she was acting a part, she was doing it to perfection. Leaning on his arm in a charmingly confiding way, she told him that she was an orphan, that she had lately arrived from the country with no baggage excepting a letter of recommendation to a large establishment where she had received employment.

Her companion paid but little attention to her recital, and made a few jesting remarks about the whiteness of her dimpled hands and the becomingness of her costume, for he was firmly convinced that the girl was playing a trick on him. At last, wearied by her sad air, he determined to creat a diversion, and also to show her that he was too thoroughly a Parisian to be easily duped.

"Let us go and have a glass of beer," he said gaily.

With an exclamation of dismay the girl let go his arm and stood still.

"Oh do not try to be so high flown," he said, taking her arm to lead her on.

But Martha drew back in affright and cried aloud—

"Help, help!"

At the sound of her voice another man, a well-built fellow, came to her rescue, exclaiming—

"Let her go, you rascal."

He dealt such hard blows upon the shoulders of Bertrand Camusard that the latter thought best to go his way without arguing the matter.

Martha then told her story to the newcomer, who in his turn informed her that his name was Pierre Carlier, and that he was bookkeeper in the office of the Western Railway. He did not, however, mention the fact of his having been wounded in the face during the war of 1870, and of his still bearing a frightful scar.

Being deeply interested in the helpless girl who had talked and listened to him without knowing of his disfigurement, which had always rendered him repulsive to women, he took her to her lodgings, and on leaving her at the door, asked permission to return the next day. She assented willingly, for the sincerity of his voice and manner inspired her with confidence.

The next morning Carlier brought a physician to examine the young girl's eyes, and his decision—that the recovery of her sight was doubtful, and would at best be slow—filled her with anxiety. Who would provide for her while she was unable to work? Pierre Carlier read the question in her face and answered quickly—

"Do not be alarmed; your employer will allow you your regular wages while you are under treatment. That is the custom; I will go to him myself and explain matters."

A few hours later he came back and reported that the head of the firm had promised not only to keep the girl's situation for her, but also to pay all her expenses till she was able to work again. Medical treatment was begun, and Carlier came to her regularly with her wages. It was but natural that he should stay and talk with her, for Martha Duflou had no friend in Paris excepting him, and she was glad to tell him of her doubts and fears. Gradually his visits became longer and more frequent, and the friendly sympathy already existing between these two afflicted ones, the blind and the disfigured, soon developed into sincere and ardent love. She was in ignorance of the terrible scar on his face, and his gentle kindness and devotion won her heart.

* * * * * * *

Three months passed, and still Martha was not cured, and at last she began to wonder that her former employer kept on paying her without making any direct inquiries as to her condition. A suspicion of the truth crossed her mind, and one day she commissioned the janitress of the house to go to the store and discover how the matter stood.

That evening, when Pierre Carlier came to see her she was deluged in tears.

"I have found you out," she said. "Oh, how generous and noble of you to let me think that the money you brought came from an employer who is utterly heartless! But, indeed, you ought not to have put such a debt upon me; it is absolutely necessary now for me to regain my sight that I may be able to pay you what I owe."

"You can more than repay me, very easily, if you will," he answered gently.

"How can I?"

"By marrying me."

"You cannot mean that!" she exclaimed in astonishment.

When he repeated his words she began to cry with joy.

"I have not seen your face," she said at last, "but I am sure that it reflects the goodness of your heart. I will be your wife on one condition."

"What is that?"

"That we are not married until I have recovered my sight."

Her decision filled her lover with dismay, and involuntarily he almost wished that she should remain blind, for he could not bear to think of seeing her turn away from him in disgust the first time she beheld his face.

"Let us be married at once," he said earnestly. "We shall be so happy. What is the use of waiting longer?"

But Martha was inflexible.

"I have already been too much of a burden to you," she said; "I will not consent to becoming a millstone fastened to your neck. If I cannot be cured at all, I will disappear, and you will never hear of me again."

"A suicide? Do you wish me to die in despair?" he cried.

But Martha felt sure that she would be cured suddenly, miraculously, and she longed to be able to give her lover a joyful surprise.

* * * * * *

It was the first Sunday in May. Spring was just decking the shrubs and trees in beautiful attire, and the meadows had begun to smile under the sun's rays.

Martha had promised to go for a walk in the country with Pierre, and he said to her a little wistfully:—

"What a pity it is that you cannot see the loveliness of nature, for that would decide you not to postpone our happiness longer."

"I can hear the birds sing, and smell the perfume of the flowers," had been the answer of the blind girl.

The appointed time had arrived, and Pierre had called for his beloved. What was his surprise to find that she had taken all the bandages from her eyes, and he fancied that she gave a slight start as she turned toward him

"Can she see?" he thought, growing pale with apprehension.

"What is the matter, dear? Ah, I know; you are astonished at my having no bandage on my eyes. There is no use in wearing it. I shall never see better than I do now. The doctors can do no more for me. And Pierre, I will not keep you waiting any longer; if you wish we can be married at once."

In his delight Carlier imagined that her eyes were smiling upon him, but the next instant he laughed at his own folly supposing that she would speak thus if she could see him,

The wedding took place four weeks from that day. When it was over, and the pair were told to sign their names in the register, Pierre took hold of the blind bride's hand to lead her to the book, but she turned away from him, saying—

"Let me alone; I can find it myself."

Then to his amazement, she went straight to the desk and took up the pen.

"You are not blind," he whispered. you can see my scar!"

"Oh, I saw that a month ago," she said, smiling at his distress, and then added softly, "Are you quite sure now that I love you, Pierre?"

It is reported that several years since a gardener discovered that by planting his squash-seeds in earth that had a layer of coal ashes above and below it, the vines were not molested by cutworms.

SCIENCE AND PROGRESS.

MATTERS OF INTEREST AND INSTRUCTION FOR ALL.

Protecting Workmen From Furnace Heat--Why a Man Can't Fly--An Automatic Candlestick--Advice to Amateur Photographers.

A New York Air Ship.

There seems to be a prevailing impression that air navigation will soon be an accomplished fact. N. Helmer of 129 Fourth avenue is now at work on designs for an aerial ship in which the electric motor operated with storage batteries will be the power to whirl the vessel through space. The balloon is a long, cylindrical affair containing a smaller cylinder connected through a pipe with an air pump on board the passenger car. The inner cylinder is used to displace some of the gas in the outer, which operation, by reducing buoyancy, will cause the ship to gradually sink down to the earth.

The balloon sails laterally and carries a finlike sail which causes it to face the wind. It is connected with the car by means of a number of ropes converging at s swivel several feet above the car proper. The swivel permits the car to swing around in every direction of the compass by means of a fan-wheel and a rudder. The swiftly revolving fanwheel imparts velocity to both the car and the passive balloon overhead, the latter being so contrived in Mr. Helmer's plans as to make it impossible to come athwart the current. The pipes communicating with the outer and inner balloons are provided with the most simply-constructed safety valves, which Mr. Helmer thinks will render accidents by explosion impossible.

He proposes to make the outer balloon of aluminum sheets prepared so as to withstand five pounds' pressure to the square inch. The inside balloon will be made of varnished silk so as to swell and decrease in size at will. Mr. Helmer said recently: "If this whole plan will be thoroughly investigated, I have no doubt that the most critical thinkers will be satisfied with it. In justice to myself, I would emphasize the fact that I have given merely the outline, but this outline demonstrates the principle as accurately as do cause and effect. The filling of the balloon, the method of holding it in place while filling it, and of releasing it when full, the construction of the safety valves, the trussed frame under the balloon, and other details are still my own personal secrets. But I can assure the public that the whole matter is the essence of simplicity and can not possibly miscarry."

Protecting Workmen From Furnace Heat.

At one of the German iron works, an ingenious method has been adopted of protecting the workmen at the puddling and heating furnaces from the heat.

A rectangular iron screen is hung from an overhead rail, and can be made to cover the whole working side of the farnace, or can be pushed aside when not required, or when it interferes with the work of the men. The lower end is bent into a gutter, which has a slight fall in the direction of its length, and the upper edge is provided on the inside, the nearest the furnace, with a pipe bored through with small holes about ¾ inches apart, which is in connection with the service pipe supplying water for cooling the sides of the bed. When in use the inside of the plate is kept constantly wet from the supply pipe, the small jets trickling down to the gutter at the bottom and running away to the cooling bosh at the side. A notch at the bottom is left for the passage of the rabble, and a short inclined plate is provided for the cinder to run over; but with these exceptions the whole surface is screened by the water-cooled plate. The arrangement, which was first applied experimentally to a few furnaces, has worked so satisfactorily that it has been fitted to the whole of the puddling furnaces in the works, as it is found that the puddlers, being protected in great part from the exhausting effects of the heat, can work full time even in the hottest summer weather.

Why a Man Can't Fly.

Professor Haxen, of the Signal Office, says there are insurmountable obstacles to perfecting a flying machine. Professor Hazen states the main obstacles thus:

1. It is impossible to use the food which the bird uses to develop power by any contrivance which can ever be invented that will give one tithe of the effect that the bird gets. That is to say, while possibly a spring or other applicatian of force, by using up an enormous amount of energy in a very short time, might momentarily imitate a bird, yet the motive power in such case would be rapidly used up.

2. It is impossible, by the most delicate mechanism and most perfect wings, to equal the perfection and adaptability of the birds in its own element.

3. There is a limit of weight beyond which it is impossible for a bird to fly. It is probable that the ostrich had the power of flight in ages gone by, but when its environment became such that it did not need its wings to escape from enemies, or when it began to grow larger from any favoring circumstanes, it used its wings less and less, so that now it is entirely incapable of flight. It is probable that the condor, weighing fifty pounds, and with a spread of wings of fourteen feet, is very near the limit of weight. We may conclude, then that we can never equal a bird, and, hence, that a self-supporting, and propelling machine can not possibly be built to carry a man.

An Automatic Candlestick.

The well-known mechanical engineer, Mr. Frank Jenkins, has found time, amid the distractions of other business, to invent a patent candlestick which is both handsome in its appearance and automatic in its operation, and possesses, among other merits, those of being durable and comparatively inexpensive.

The candle being held in a spring frame, is caused to burn entirely down without readjusting the holder, and without any waste or fouling. When the candle is burned, the remaining piece of wick and the few remaining drops of the candle fall automatically into the removable bowl from which all may be easily emptied, and the candlestick is then clean and ready for another candle. As in ordinary candlesticks, the fag end of the candle usually melts into waste, the relative economy of the improved candlestick is not less apparent than its convenience, in admitting of the use of shorter candles when desired. As the candle for some years past has been steadily regaining its old place in public favor, and Mr. Jenkins' candlestick admits of also being made in ornamental forms, in addition to the smoothly polished brass; copper and nickle-plated styles designed for general use, there is likely to be a large demand for it.

Advice to Amateur Photographers.

A Bogardus, in a recent article, gives some excellent advice to amateur photographers. He says; "If you would succeed in your experiments let everything you use be the best of its kind. A poor camera-box and a weak lens will not give good results. Have the dark room and everything in it in perfect order. Use great care in every part of the process. Carelessness never succeeds. Do not be satisfied with any kind of an impression because some ignorant person has told you you are doing splendidly. If you are anxious to excel in photography learn to develop the negative and to print from it. Do not carry your plates to a professional to develop and print them for you. If you do, how much of the picture is your own execution? Anybody can put a plate in a camera and expose it. Do not attempt portraits of friends; they will find fault with them and laugh at you. Your sitter will not like his or her expression, and will say it is your fault. Use your plates to make landscapes or views. Do everything deliberately. Do not neglect to dust the plate before inserting it in the slide, or the picture will be despoiled by dustspots. Learn to use a reliable plate, and do not change. Use one formula for a developer, and keep on doing so until you are master of it." The amateur photographer is finally exhorted to master whatever difficulties present themselves, and not to get discouraged.

New Use for the Papaw.

In the West Indies, one of the characteristics of an intelligent cook is the care with which he or she will see to it that a papaw tree is growing within a short distance of the kitchen door. The fruit of the papaw, if large and well grown, is not to be despised as a breakfast dish, and its rich golden flesh is to many much more palatable than that of the popular melon. But the attractiveness of the papaw for the cook consists in its leaves, which possess the remarkable property of rendering meat tender. The toughest beefsteak or the most hopeless old rooster can be made soft and comparatively juicy by being wrapped for an hour or two in the large, dark green papaw leaves. Dr. Mortimer Granville, who has been for sometime studying the properties of the juice which works such wonders, states that he has discovered in it a remedy for cancer, when used with some other preparations. The organized ferment of the papaw is believed to be a bacillus; but Dr. Granville says he has satisfied himself of the therapeutic value of the juice, or certain of its elements, as a solvent of the morbifically indurated tissues in cancer, when administered in combination with certain specified adjuncts.

Wire Finer Than Hair.

The wire used in making the receiving instruments of ocean cables, the galvanometers used in testing cables and measuring the insulation of covered wires, and other delicate instruments, is possessed of remarkable fineness. Some of this wire is 1-500th of an inch in diameter, finer than the hair of the human head. Ordinary fine wire which is drawn through steel plates, would be useless in this work, because if the hole wore away ever so little, the wire would become larger, and therefore unserviceable. Instead of going through this process the wire is drawn through what is practically a hole in a diamond, to which there is no appreciable wear. These diamond plates are made by a woman in New York, who has a monopoly of the art in this country. The wire is then run through machinery which winds it spirally with a layer of silk thread that is .0015 of an inch in thickness, even finer than the wire.

Writing on Metals.

To write inscriptions on metals, says the Manufacturers' Gazette, take four ounces of nitric acid and one ounce of muriatic acid, mix and shake well together, and it is ready for use. Then cover your metal surface to be engraved with beeswax or soap, write your inscription plainly in the wax clear to the metal, then apply the mixed acids with a feather or a stick of wood, carefully filling each letter, let it remain from five to ten minutes, according to appearance desired, then throw on water, which stops the etching process, and the inscription is completed.

TEN MINUTES TO TWELVE

BY M. G. McCLELLAND.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

don't happen more'n once a fortnight we lose over fifteen or twenty minutes."

He walked away with uplifted shoulders, which gave to the back of his coat an expression of protest against intemperate haste. And Royal, as though that could expedite matters, established himself on the platform.

He was vexed and tormented by a delay which threatened shipwreck to his scheme by depriving him of the time necessary for explanations and readjustments. His sympathy and interest had become so involved that he had come to feel a personal pride in carrying the affair through to a successful issue—to feel that he had heralded himself to enter the lists against caprice and injustice, and was in danger of failure, not through lack of prowess, but through extraneous and exasperating circumstances. So completely did the matter absorb and possess him that obstacles, instead of daunting his resolution and causing him to reconsider the situation, only aroused and concentrated his forces as though they had been obstructions in the path of his individual hopes and fortune.

He was anxious also about the patient he had been compelled to leave in the care of an inexperienced young fellow, downy with graduation honors and self confidence, whom he had picked up in the office of the hotel. The case was so serious that the least mismanagement might precipitate the result.

Held aloof by preoccupation, Royal failed to appreciate or even note the grand uplifting of the country round about, the exquisite tracery of the winter forest, the delicate hue of the sky, or the wonderful harmony of tone given by the shading of earth and rocks, tree stems and fading vegetation. Even the quick leap of a brook escaped him, and the grace of the curve with which, like a queen's obeisance to a rival power, it turned aside from the embankment of the railway and pursued its lovely, murmurous journey down the mountain. Higher up the road ran at the foot of cliffs covered with laurel and scrub pine and cedar, whose gray bowlders jutted up through dark mold and the brownness of fallen leaves, relieved and brightened here and there by patches of partridgeberry and teaberry vines, which grew low, and showed vivid scarlet against dark green, where birds and rabbits had left the fruit ungathered. Against the rocks, in sheltered nooks, where the wind could not despoil them, were long trails of bramble vines and poison oak holding bunches of dark purple berries and tufts of crimson leaves.

Through a long cutting, whose sides showed the presence of iron ore, the train steamed out into a broad valley, and drew up at a small station with deceitful briskness and a self laudatory whistle of accomplished duty. Royal lost no time in transferring himself and his impatience to the station platform.

"Anybody here for Dr. Royal?"

The question was impersonally addressed to a little knot of loungers, and Royal paused for a reply, wondering what the dickens he should do if thrown on his own resources.

A thickset man in a gray overcoat copiously patched with blue—a relic of secession reconstructed—advanced to meet him.

"You're Dr. Royal yerse'f, I reckon. Ain't yo?" he questioned.

"Done forgot me, I reckon, doctor, but I ain't forgot you. We all used to hunt an' fish together back yondor befo' you went to school. My name's Jim Dodson; that'll fix you, I reckon. Hurry right along. You ain't got time to talk now, I know, an' we'll hitch up them six years arter a while. Come this a-way. Squire Brandon sent the buggy, an' Spot driv; but that mar' o' his'n can't abide engines, nother she don't like strangers, so Spot he hilt her here behind the depot an' axed me to look out fur you."

He tilted up his hat brim and cast an observing eye skyward. Royal perceived the man's mistake, but had not time to rectify it. Behind the station stood a buggy, mud splashed and untidy, but strong and serviceable; between the shafts was a dark bay with a good deal of white to her eye and apparently considerable go in her. A gentlemanly lad of fourteen or thereabout stood at her head and glanced anxiously toward the train. At sight of Royal his countenance cleared and he accosted him cheerily:

"All right, doctor! How are you? Jump right in. I thought judgment day would beat that train coming. Hallo! I forgot about the accident! Here, Jim, stand by her head, please, while I help Dr. Royal in. We've got to make tracks."

"You have that!" observed a bystander. The whole group had followed Royal round the station, and appeared fully aware of the situation and deeply interested in it.

Filled with amusement, and feeling hypocritical, Royal declined the boy's proffered shoulder and took his place in the buggy. Spotswood sprang in beside him, gathered up the reins, and they were off, followed by a shout from Jim Dodson:

"Make her everlastin' toddle, Spotswood! The sun's a-clamberin' up to'ards the j'ist mighty rapid. If you don't step out peart, 12 o'clock will ketch you-all gwine."

"I reckon not," the boy shouted back. "Clipper knows how to travel."

Then he turned with a reassuring air to Royal: "Don't you fret, doctor. We'll make it now I've got you behind Clipper. I shook in my shoes though awhile back, that confounded train dawdled so. It looked like fate was dead against you."

"Why don't somebody report those trainmen?" demanded Royal, still incensed over the delay and longing to punish somebody.

The boy laughed. "Where's the use?" he demanded in his turn. "They've got a monopoly, and complaints would go in at one ear and out at the other. They aren't often so much behind as they were today though, and I don't wonder you wanted to lay on the whip. We'd have made better time from the station on horseback, but Phyllis was afraid the ride would knock you up. The road isn't bad, however, and we can make it driving if we look sharp." He whistled to his horse and touched her lightly with the whip.

"Half an hour's drive to the house, and fifteen minutes to the church—for Clipper," the boy replied concisely. "The road's been altered since you used to know it, I reckon: but you'll remember where the church is—the one Miss Royal built just after she came to the old place in memory of John Hart. She's buried there, you know, under that big oak near the vestry window. She told Phyl once, a long time ago, that she wanted her to be married there. Phyl has been with us ever since Miss Royal died, but the church is close by and mighty convenient. Phyl wanted to be married from the old place, but my mother wouldn't hear of it. The house has been shut up for nearly four months, you know: it's bound to be damp and stuffy."

"Where are you going now?" Royal questioned, the demand for new plans making itself disconcertingly apparent.

"Straight to the church. If the train was on time I was to drive you out home: if it wasn't, right to the church. Phyl and the rest will meet you there."

The road had entered a skirt of woods, and was firmer and more free from ruts and mud holes. Clipper responded to the improvement in a style which won Royal's admiration. Young Brandon listened with the air of personal merit mingled with assumed deprecation with which the creature masculine always hearkens to praises of his horse. He was in high feather, filled with pride in his mission, and chatted away merrily. His father—old Squire Brandon, as he was called—had intended meeting the train himself, but had been prevented at the last minute. Just the scurvy sort of trick fate had been playing John Royal all through, the sick man's representative thought, as he heard it. Here was more time irrevocably wasted, for it would be useless explaining matters to this boy.

The boy meanwhile, considering himself, evidently, not a deputy to be despised, put his horse along with a deft avoidance of stones, mud holes, and other impedimenta which to Royal, unaccustomed to mountain roads, seemed little short of marvellous. He increased Royal's perplexity, too, with every word he uttered, and with every intention of being agreeable forced more and more absolutely upon that gentleman the consciousness that things were at a deadlock.

"It was all right about the license," Spotswood gleefully assured him. "Tom had attended to that: Tom was to be best man, as he doubtless knew. The preacher would be up to the notch also: Uncle Jeff—Miss Royal's old carriage driver—had gone for him at daybreak. The wedding was everybody's wedding, Phyl said. And it looked like it; for the whole neighborhood wanted to take a hand. Phyl was mighty popular, and then people felt so sorry for her."

Royal, curiously enough, felt nettled through all his perplexity, and then realized with an inward touch of amusement that he was appropriating not only John Royal's position, but what might naturally be John Royal's feelings under the circumstances.

At a point where the road forked young Brandon suddenly drew up his horse and handed the reins to his companion.

"Hold her a minute, please," he said, and faced about to the wood on the right, put both hands to his mouth, and gave vent to a long drawn eddying howl, which echoed and re-echoed among the trees with a peculiarly penetrating cadence. It was like nothing which Royal, for all his experience of Indians, "loavers" and coyotes, had ever heard in his life before, and, had he but known it, was simply a differentiation of the old "rebel yell," still used among the mountains as a signal.

In a second it was answered, and the lad dropped back to his seat and put out his hand for the reins.

"What was that for?" demanded Royal, feeling that he was getting all of adventure he could possibly desire.

Spotswood laughed, and turned his horse into the road to the left. "To let 'em know it's all right and we've gone on to the church," he explained. "We were afraid something might happen to prevent your coming, in spite of what you wrote Phyl. And it wouldn't have done for her to go to the church and no wedding after all, you know. She'd have been mortified, even if you couldn't help it. Women are different from us," with protective assumption. "Their feelings have got to be allowed for. Tom and I put up that job. He had a little nigger on horseback in the woods there, and when I whooped he was to gallop back to the house and tell 'em. There's a short cut that way. If you hadn't come I'd have howled twice. They'll get to the church almost as soon as we will."

The lad's consideration touched Royal. In his frontier experience the life had been too free from conventionality, and human interpendence had been too readily and practically recognized, for him to wonder over the interest these people appeared to take in each other's concerns and the trouble they voluntarily put themselves to in each other's behalf. That seemed to him legitimate and natural, but at the same time it increased the difficulty of the position. In their love and care for the girl these people would doubtless demand not only elaborate explanation of his plan, but some sort of credentials for himself before they would allow so unprecedented a thing as a marriage by proxy to take place. The bucolic mind did not assimilate ideas readily, nor was it avid of experiment. And what could they know of the anguish, the insistence of the poor fellow dying down there in Matoacca? If only he had time to make them feel the pathos of those last words John Royal had uttered as they shook hands ere his own departure: "Man, see to it that you do your work well! I'm trusting with you what I value more than life. Don't fail me! Help me to save her from poverty—from dependence."

They seemed to ring in his ears, to beat on his heart, to grasp and hold and compel him like sentient things.

He looked at his watch. Three-quarters of an hour to expound his scheme, combat objections, satisfy curiosity, allay scruples and get through the marriage ceremony. It could not be done. No thought of abandoning his plan crossed his mind; he simply readjusted it. He would marry the young lady first and make the explanation afterward. So far he had been accepted as John Royal's self instead of John Royal's representative—any changes in appearance apparently accounted for by the lapse of six years in intercourse. He must carry out the deception until the ceremony should have been performed, after which, of course, must come the explanation. The spirit of adventure was strong in him, and he was conscious of the thrill an actor knows when his cast is on the razor edge between success and failure, and may be made or marred by an expression or a gesture.

The lad, busy with his horse and intent on speed, was silent. The road left the woods and emerged on to a lovely plateau, gently rolling and studded with groups of superb trees—oak, hickory, maple and sweet gum. It was sheltered by hills and carpeted with short grass which showed green even in December. Near the center, amid a clump of oaks, stood a quaint, picturesque stone church, with pointed windows and ivy covered walls. It was inclosed by a stone fence, and the space inside was evidently used for a burying ground. Under the trees, outside the inclosure, a spring gushed forth, near which were racks for horses and a place where the animals might drink. Royal noticed several vehicles, spring wagons mostly, standing about, and horses, a dozen or so, some tied to the racks and some to swinging limbs, according as their dispositions were sedate or nervous.

Spotswood drove round to a side gate, and a negro came and took the horse. He looked smiling and important, and bowed affably to Royal, half extending his hand, which Royal grasped and cordially shook, not knowing him, of course, but dissembling.

"Many folks inside, Uncle Jeff?" the boy questioned, indicating at the same moment by a gesture to his companion the spot where Miss Royal had been buried.

"Tol'r'ble smart, sir; de body's fullin' up, an' dar's a right smart sprinklin' in de gall'ry. Dar come mo' folks now. Dey been practisin' de music over, sir, an' hit soun' mighty pretty an' consolin'."

This last was addressed to Royal, who dumbly felt that before he should get through with the affair he might be in need of consolation.

In the vestry they were received by two gentlemen who were introduced by Spotswood as his brother Tom and the Rev. Carter Braxton. Both men shook hands with Royal with enthusiasm, and Tom Brandon helped him off with his overcoat, remarking that he "looked a trifle off color, but on the whole fitter than they had expected."

Royal, who felt that twenty-four sleepless hours, two sketchy and insufficient meals and a tremendous strain of anxiety and excitement lay between his present self and the man who boarded the train so tumultuously the day before, did not wonder that he should look his part at least sufficiently to pass muster.

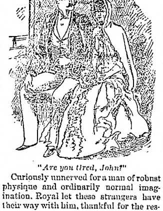
With the climax so close upon him a strange, still, all powerful excitement seized on Royal and thrilled through every nerve and tissue like an electric current. His pulses quivered, his heart beat thick and rapidly and the blood rose to his brain. He replied to their inquiries like a man in a dream, and was conscious of a vague sense of confused identity. As he stood before the mirror, placed in a corner for clerical convenience, he caught himself dimly questioning his own existence as apart from the existence of that other John Royal, dimly seeking to identify his own features with those of the man from whose sick bed he had come. Life and circumstance for the time became unreal to him, and he accepted the sequence of events as impersonally as a somnambulist could have done. Individual will seemed, as it were, in abeyance, held under and dominated by a force with which it was powerless to cope. He seemed himself, and yet other than himself, more than himself.

The minister in his robes stood, book in hand, within the chancel rail; the wedding march burst forth with joyous invitation; a group of black coated men and maidens all in white came up the aisles, crossed each other and ranged themselves about the chancel. And Royal, still like a man in a dream, advanced from the vestry door with Tom Brandon at his side, and received from the hands of a white haired gentleman the lace enveloped figure of his unknown bride. Her hand lay on his arm, the folds of her shining robe brushed against him, the lace which covered her drooping head almost touched his shoulder, but he did not look at her nor manifest by so much as the quiver of a muscle consciousness of her proximity. His individuality seemed lost, merged in that of the man whose part he had assumed. His imagination was strained, his pulses beat with excitement, but his brain was clear, his perceptions preternaturally acute. He could hear the snap of a watchcase somewhere among the audience, and the stamping of the horses outside distinctly through the rhythm of the music. The interest of the spectators thrilled him, but failed to renew recognition of being other than he seemed.

Then, amid the hush which followed the cessation of the music, came the minister's solemn statement of the purpose for which the people were there assembled, and his impressive charge to them that if any man knew aught which should prevent this union he should set it forth, followed by the pause which is so seldom broken. Then, in tones that sounded in his ears as the voice of another man, Royal found himself repeating words which, with the strange sense of duality which oppressed him, seemed to bind him, as well as that other, to the woman beside him as with bands of steel; and when, her answering vow breathed forth, he received the ring, it was as though another hand was with his hand, guiding it as he placed the circlet on her finger. And a terrible sense of irrevocability and powerlessness for a moment overwhelmed him, turning him faint and sick, as one on whom a heavy blow has fallen.

Then he realized that everything was over, and that the people had glanced at their watches for the last time and were pressing forward with congratulations. He moved aside and involuntarily took out his own watch and noted the time. It wanted ten minutes to 12.

CHAPTER IV.



"Are you tired, John?"

Curiously unnerved for a man of robust physique and ordinarily normal imagination, Royal let these strangers have their way with him, thankful for the respite which their quiet acceptance of him gave. He avoided looking at the bride, dreading to meet her glance lest it should unfit him for his part, for with the sight of the crowd his desire to explain matters withdrew into the background. This was not the time, nor was it the place. The affair had developed complications for which he was totally unprepared, and he wanted time to think, to assimilate and readjust. The sequence of events had been so different from his own preconceived arrangement of them that his mind for the moment was thrown out of gear, and stood supine, accepting that which came as though it were a finality.

The thing most evident to him was that he had ensnared himself with a network of egregious blundering, and that egress from it, to be graceful or even endurable, would require more skill of management than he had any right to accredit himself with possessing. The terms in which he apostrophized himself summed up the case, and were none the less hearty and comprehensive for being inwardly given. "Of all the intermeddling, dunderheaded fools in this world," so ran his thoughts, "you are entitled to the lead, Hart Royal. And a beautiful mess you've gotten yourself into this time, with your damned officiousness!"

The preoccupation of his manner and the careworn expression of his face caused the people to surmise that he must be in acute physical pain. For the few moments allowed to friends at country weddings—even church weddings—they crowded round him, striving to recall themselves to his memory, and speaking pitifully of the accident and enthusiastically of his pluck in not allowing it to interfere with his marriage. They were so kind and cordial that Royal could have gnashed his teeth and shouted at them that he was no better than an impostor. Instead of which he nailed his false colors to the mast, as it were, and smiled and bowed and shook hands with everybody.

His brain worked with feverish rapidity, and by the time they had shut him

Happy Hoosiers.

Wm. Timmons, Postmoster of Idaville. Ind., writes: "Electric Bitters has done more for me than all other medicines combined for that bad feeling arising from Kidney and Liver trouble." John Leslie, farmer and stockman, of same place, says: "Find Electric Bitters to be the best Kidney and Liver medicine, made me feel like a new man." J. W. Gardner, harware merchant, same town, says: Electric Bitters is just the thing for a man who is all run down and don't care weather he lives or dies; he found new strength, good appetite and felt just like he had a new lease on life. Only 50c. a bottle, at W. A. Schreiter's Drug Store.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicago to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 5th, 1891.—Everything seems to be moving on all right toward a settlement of the Behring Sea dispute and the protection of the seals. Lord Salisbury is more than ready to meet the United States half way on the question to be submitted to arbitrators. In the meantime the seals are to have a closed season this summer and will be protected by both the United States and the British government. Some of the Canadian poachers announce an intention to sail under German and French flags and continue the profitable although destructive business of killing seals, but they will change their minds when the United States and Great Britain unite to to drive them from Alaska waters.

Walter Wellman, the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Herald, sailed from New York yesterday on a novel expedtion. He goes with Charles Ledlerer, the noted artist, and a photographer, a servant and a mechanic, to search out the spot where Christopher Columbus first set foot upon the soil of the New World in 1492. If successful in locating the spot,—the location of which has been a matter of great doubt and of endless dispute between historians and geographers,—the expedition will there erect a monument commemorative of Columbus' great achievement. The party will first go to Nassau, the Capitol of the Bahama Islands, which are British dominions, and will there charter a vessel to cruise among the islands. Their plan is to take up first the track on which Columbus is known to have approached the American Continent, and with a traslation of his log book in hand, and all the other evidence under consideration, to fix the spot. When found a monument is to be built on it in honor of the famous discoverer. The Herald expedition goes well equipped with the accessories of a campairn in the tropics. Its commanding officer, Mr. Wellmen, is a young man of great experience as a journalist, and with the physical strength and endurance of an athlete.

The United Press, one of the two great Press News Associations of the country, has just inaugurated an innovation upon past methods of supplying news to the Southern journals. Heretofore news was sent to its Southern patrons over Western Union telegraph wires, and delivered to the newspapers from Western Union offices. But now the United Press sends its news over leased wires, direct to the editorial rooms of its Southern clients between Washington and Charleston and Atlanta. The wires are extended to the newspaper offices, where proficient telegraph operators convert the ticking of the instruments into copy ready for the hands of the typesetters. This new departure in the dissemination of news is in keeping with the progress of the times and in harmony with the enterprising journalism of the new South.

While further experiments are to be made with the pneumatic dynamite guns of the Vesuvius, many naval officers believe they will be superseded by guns that will fire high explosives from a powder gun. The French government have been working on that line lately and claim remarkable results with a high explosive called melenite The ordnance bureau of the navy department has been making similar experiments with a high explosive called Emmersite, recently and succeeded in firing it twenty-five times from a twenty-pounder bronze rifle, but on the twenty-fifth round, the shell exploded in the gun. Improvements are being made from time to time on these compounds and it is very probable that within the next year or two high explosives will be successfully fired from powder guns,

The civil cervice commission occasionly wants to secure a high order of intellect for about three dollars a day. Their latest want came out to-day in an anouncement that an examination will be held by the commission the latter part of this month to fill a vacancy in the position of computer in the hydrographic office of the navy department. The salary will be the munificent figure of $3.25 per day and the scientist or scholar securing the place will have to head the list in an examination on letter writing, geometra, algebra, trigonometry and astronomy. If the commission is successful in securing a satisfactory man for this place at such a salary it will be pretty good evidence that talented and educated people in that line are cheap and plentiful.

Bicycle Notes.

Why is a cyclist like a hedgehog? He prefers a spring to a fall.

There are many things easier than following H. M. Kaus on a bicycle.

Why would a rider of an unsafety, or a high bicycle, be a good telegraph editor? He knows all about making "headers."

There is no reason why our cyclists couldn't give a successful Fourth of July dance. Their machines are all ball-bearing.

When a wheel runs in uneven scallops it is not evidence that the rider is not a prohibitionist; it is uncharitable to form hasty opinions on that ground.

A crowd will probadly go to the circus June 19 at Crookston. Don't know whether an engagement for fancy riding has been made with any of the boys.

It's all right now, as a thorough examination has proven—but every one who saw that 5 foot rail entangle itself in his spokes, voted Phil the "spokesmanship."

It is the general supposition that riding bicycles is more fatiguing to the rider than to the wheel. Tellesfore tired his machine completely a couple of weeks ago, however.

The rider who took a jump from the sidewalk at Bangs & Co.'s and the other rider who ran into a rut on Main st and slid along the ground several feet, will tell you that ther's nothing like a safety for safety.

A Bad Runaway.

From The Crookston Times.

Charles Mead and W. A Schreiter of Red Lake Falls arrived in the city Thursday in a badly crippled and sadly demoralized condition. They started to drive down from the Falls in the morning with a new top buggy, an old harness and a pair of runaway bronchos. When they had arrived within a mile or so of Gentilly, a defective tug gave way, allowing the pole of the buggy to drop to the ground. This started the horses to running. Mead held to the lines and endeavered to stop them, but was unable to do so. In the meantime Mr. Schreiter succeeded in getting the buggy top down and jumped out, and Mead says he lit on his right ear and turned fourteen summersalts before he finally landed in the ditch. Mead retained his hold on the lines for a little way further, but seeing he had no chance to stop the team he too jumped and went through the same evolutions his companion had performed. Just after he jumped the buggy tongue, which had been plowing up the ground for about a mile, run into a gopher hill and the buggy was flung so high into the air that when it came down it was shivered into kindling wood. The boys were both badly shaken up but they managed to drag themselves in Gentilly, where their horses had been caught and they obtained another buggy and drove to Crookston. They were around yesterday each carrying e cane—and they weren't dude canes either.

Timeliness and Style in Advertising.

The trite comment upon success of any sort that "there is everything in knowing how" is particularly applicable to the business of advertising. Merchants generally advertise their business, but not many of them regard advertising as a part of their business; that is, they don't put business brightness and business methods into their advertising. Judicious advertising pays every time, and he who knows now to advertise judiciously is a better equipped business man than is his merchant neighbor who does not know when and how to advertise. A striking advertisement will run the gamut of popular attention and get into the air like a popular song. Advertisements have become as familiar as household words, and remained advertisements long after they had disappeared from newspaper columns and from advertising billboards. "You press the button; we do the rest." It is hardly necessary to state what these words advertise. They have been so widely read and are so taking and so suggestive of ability that everybody knows what they refer to. To show to what extent an advertisement with brightness in it gets into the public mind, the fact may be cited in relation to the advertisement and r comment that no less a personage than Chauncey M. Depew, in a speech before the merchants of New York at their annual dinner, closed an interesting statement of the advantages of reciprocity with the remark, "As merchants, as bankers and business men, we say to congress in the language which advertises that most universal and productive of our institutions, the Kodak, 'You press the button; we will do the rest.' "—Milwaukee Wisconsin.

It Would be Better

If it were just a whit warmer.

If those pugilists would either do it or be mum.

If the street lights were turned up a little higher.

If we had a good 24th of June or a 4th celebration on the tapis.

If the artesian well had been started at some other point than where it was.

If the business men would not complain of dull times when they are doing a big business.

If owners of defective sidewalks took the proper interest in the matter and repaired them.

If the attendance at church sociables were much larger than it usually is in Red Lake Falls.

If a more liberal spirit pervaded our citizens in all things—especially in the matter of the newspaper.

If the man whose wife is away wouldn't attemp to make an impression on every young lady in the county.

If the village council passed an ordinance to compel use of brick chimneys instead of stove pipes on all houses.

If Red Lake Falls business men would all advertise and thus help themselves and the publisher on the road to prosperity.

If some one would call that rag picker down, as he doesn't pay for his rags, and furthermore we don't feel safe while he is around.

If the street committee would see to fixing up the right pier under the Clearwater bridge, as it will tip over one of these days if not soon attended to.

If the school board publishdd their proceedings. The people are always interested in matters pertaining to the schools, and could have the information through this medium.

Mind Reading.

The feats of mind reading performed by the late Irving Bishop were wonderful, savored a good deal of the supernatural, though he always claimed there was nothing mysterious about it. Johnston, the phenomenal product of the Northwest, has given some wonderful exhibitions, though skeptics have not been wanting who denounced him as a palpable fraud. There is another kind of mind reading not so difficult as that attempted by Bishop and Johnston—to read the mind of the public on a subject of great interest. During the past five years, "The Burlington" has carried it to all parts of the country thousands and thousands of the bright people of the Northwest, and if you ask any one what he thinks of that line, you can, before he speaks, read his mind on that question, by noting how pleasant recollections of speed, comfort, and safety cause his face to light up and a smile to break forth. For assistance in thismatter ask your local agent for aticet via "The Burlington," or write to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent C. B. & N. R. R. St Paul Minn.

Whither, O Death, the spirit proud,
The soul of melody?
Now lost in silence,—or in song
Of yet diviner key.

The courage that undaunted wrought
To noble destiny,
A name to art and fame allied
By nature's own decree.

O singer, lost to light and love,
E'en to thy latest breath,
The calm serenity of trust
And faith unfearing death.

Yet life from blossom sweet to priceless gem
Held offered palm to thee,
And more than these thy womanhood
And gift of melody!

All hearts are touched to new accord
By this sweet message given:
"The song I next shall sing will be
The song I love in Heaven."

HIS LAST CIGAR.

"Hullo! Jack, old boy, when did you come?" and I rose from my chair by the desk to grasp the hand of Jack Marshall, who had most unexpectedly walked into my office one gray afternoon in November.

"Last night. Came in on the midnight train. We were several hours late, and you may guess I wasn't sorry when we struck this old town," answered Jack, as he returned my welcoming hand-shake with one of his own large-hearted grips.

"I am right glad to see you; but what brings you back to our neck of the woods just at this time?" I asked, while I offered him a chair, which he drew up beside the grate. "Business or pleasure or both?" And having seated myself opposite him I leaned forward and punched the fire to get up a more cheerful blaze.

"That's it, Ned; you've struck it exactly. It's both," answered Jack, as he settled down in his chair and clasped his hands back of his shapely head.

The day was a chilly one, and best to be enjoyed in a nook by the ingleside. I might have busied myself about a number of small matters with profit, but it was all business that would keep, and I didn't get a chance to have a chat with Jack every day. For years we had been the most devoted and confidential of friends, as loyal as Damon and Pythias, and up to this time neither had shared the affections of the other with a rival of either sex.

We had never been separated for any great length of time till three years before, when Jack, having grown impatient and restless, determined to go west and seek his fortune, and, possibly, if he liked it, to stay and "grow up with the country."

He had grown very eloquent in his efforts to induce me to accompany him, and for a time I had quite a notion of yielding to his importunities. But the knowledge of how great a sacrifice it would be to the little mother to leave the home and friends so dear to her had finally prevailed, and I staid behind to pound law-books on my native heath, and to forget, as best I could, the rose-colored dreams that I had cherished of wealth and fame coming to me as if by magic in the new west.

I had already been to a great extent rewarded for the sacrifice—for sacrifice it certainly was—by a piece of good fortune, which bade fair to be of considerable financial benefit. I had been taken into the firm by my father's old friend and partner, and I will confess that I had been highly gratified, not to say flattered, to be thought worthy to step into my father's shoes. To my further questioning as to what good fortune I owed my present visit with him Jack replied in the rich, musical voice that I loved so well to hear:

"You're just right in guessing that I came on business, and that there's a deal of pleasure mixed up with the business. I've missed you more than you know, old fellow, and I should have been back here a good many times in the last few years if money grew on bushes, as it doesn't, even in the great west, though I've no reason to complain. I've done even better than I expected, but until quite recently I have all the time had a vague notion that sometime I should be back here again. To stay, I mean. I've nothing to keep me here as you have, but it's the old home, after all, and although father and mother are gone and the boys scattered, I have a good many tender thoughts about old Marshalltown when I am gone away. But now my plans are more definite, and I have come back to settle up my affairs connected with the estate, and then I shall have burned my bridges behind me."

"What does it all mean, Jack?" I gasped faintly, feeling intuitively that there was some revelation to be made which would explain what had so suddenly settled his plans. "You don't mean to tell me that you are going to be married?"

For a moment I felt an almost feminine jealousy, and an insane desire to throttle the girl who had come between me and my best friend. My worse fears were realized when he answered;

"Right again, Ed. Why, you're really quite a mind-reader.

"Is there anything particularly moon-struck in my apperance that enables you to read my secrets?" and Jack took a squint at himself in the glass across the room.

"Oh, no; not at all," I hastened to assure him, feeling ashamed that I had experienced any emotion but joy at the idea, when I saw how his face lighted up at the mere mention of his matrimonial prospects. "But let's have it. For of course you have come to tell me about her," feeling my heart soften a trifle toward the girl who had cut me out, in my anxiety to know what she was like, and how she chanced to find a road to Jack's manly heart.

I hitched my chair near the fire, feeling an unmistakable interest in the forthcoming love story, despite a sharp twinge of jealousy which would obtrude itself, struggle against it as I might.

"Have a cigar, old boy," I said, as he seemed about to begin.

"No, thank you Ned; I don't smoke," returned Jack, with a smile, which immediately broke into a laugh, as he saw the look of surprise, almost consternation, on my face.

"Don't smoke!" I exclaimed. "Since when, I should like to know? If I remember rightly you were the one most fond of the weed when last we met. I shouldn't have been at all surprised if you had told me that you smoked like chimney all the while by this time, for I used to think you were very fond of your cigar."

"So I was, but I've sworn off, and I'm not sorry for it, either though when I see you looking down your nose as though you'd lost your last friend I could almost wish my resolutions were like Rip Van Winkle's, so I needn't 'count this time.'"

"Well, well, will wonders never cease?" I said, trying to cheer up a trifle. "Going to jump the broomstick, and have quit smoking. If I was a woman I'd faint." Perhaps," as suddenly a new thonght struck me, "your approaching nuptials have something to do with this new whim of yours," I said, a little spitefully, feeling that a great gulf had come between Jack and I indeed, when we could not even have one of the old time smokes together.

"You have guessed just right, for the third time. You are surely very clever, and I'll bet a good hat that you're a sharp lawyer. However, I won't keep you in suspense any longer, for as Nan would say: 'I know you are dying to know all about it.'"

"Nan—well, the name sounds rather jolly. On the whole I believe I like it, and now for the love story.

"All right, here goes," said Jack, tipping back in his chair; "but don't be disappointed if it isn't much like a novel, for although I'm free to confess that I'm head over ears in love, I suspect I'm not very good at romancing, after all, and you will bear with me.

"To begin with, she isn't a beauty. Never in my wildest moments have I called her beautiful, though she is just as far from being homely. The first time I ever saw her was in no more romantic a spot than a crowded street car. It was toward the close of a Saturday afternoon last June, when the streets were full of busy people, hurrying, scurrying in all directions, walking or riding, as the case might be. I had let several cars go by myself before attempting to board one, for they were crowded to their fullest capacity, and I had rather walk any time than hang on by my eyelids when every seat is taken. For this reason I could understand the situation perfectly, when at one of the crossings, a lady, after a moment's hesitation, sat down in one of the seats usually reserved for smokers.

"I had just lighted one of my choicest, and as I sat so far from her as to feel sure that my smoking could not possibly annoy her, and as she was an entire stranger to me, I did not feel that I was guilty of an unpardonable breach of etiquette, because I did not see fit to cast my fragrant cigar beneath the jugernautic wheels of the car. I smoked on for awhile, and had almost forgotten the little lady's existence, when chancing to look up, I caught her eye.

Of course, she looked away instantly, but not until I had seen an expression of surprise and reproach in her honest brown eyes which made me feel a trifle uncomfortable. It didn't seem to me that she was so particularly annoyed at my smoking in her presence as she was troubled that I was doing it at all. I think I considered myself quite an exemplary fellow before, but that one look set me to thinking and wondering.

"It is true I had often heard women —and worthy women they were, too— rail about the 'vile, filthy habit,' but that always rouses my antagonism, and then I don't care. On the other hand, I had heard ladies mincingly remark that they 'rather liked the smell of a good cigar.' You know that chestnut. But there was something unlike very different from anything like harsh or unjust criticism in the mild rebuke which I saw in her eyes as she looked up. There was none of that air about her as though she considered a man who would smoke on a par with a sot in the gutter. Only she made you feel that she expected better things of you, and was sorry to have you disappoint her.

"However, I shifted my position a little, and tried to feel indifferent; but somehow the cigar had lost considerable of its flavor, and though I still continued to smoke, I could not forget the look with which she had regarded me. She was a lady; every inch. It was evident in every detail and in the refined ease of her manners. You know, I'm something of a crank in my ideas of a lady's dress. I always was particular, and I've no doubt it's the natural result of being in the dry-goods business.

"Well, this little woman couldn't have pleased me better if she had got herself up purposely for my scrutiny, and I began to feel interested. I stole a look now and then when I could do so unobserved, and the oftener I looked the more I felt that there was nothing about the choicest of tobacco smoke in harmony with her. Not that she seemed an ethereal creature—one of the sort 'too wise and good for human nature's daily food.' Not at all. She was only a nineteenth-century girl who was going home from a shopping expedition; but a perfect lady, and one whose high ideas and lofty principles shone out in her frank, bright eyes.

"Well, I presume I've no need to tell you that I watched to see in which direction she went when she left the car, which she did only a few blocks before I reached my own destination. To say that I was really smitten would not be the truth. I don't think it entered my head at all that I might have followed at a respectful distance and found out where she lived, as they do in the regulation love story. I presume I didn't have the least idea that I should ever see her again, but I will confess that I thought about her a good many times during the next few weeks, and though I didn't stop smoking at this juncture, I never lighted a cigar without feeling that she was looking at me with reproachful eyes, and after I had lighted it I didn't altogether enjoy it.

"In all probability, I should have forgotten all about it in a little while, however, had it not been for an invitation to a reception which I received not long after my street-car ride. I had no particular interest in the reception except that the lady who gave it—Mrs. Wells—is an old friend of father's, and she has been very kind to me since I have been in the city. At all events, I went and had the unique pleasure of meeting the lady who had so interested me. I had paused by the library door for a short chat with Harry Wells, who is a fine young fellow about my age, when, happening to look up, saw the same pair of eyes regarding me that had caused me so much uneasiness on the car. They were turned away as quickly as in the former case, but I was not a little pleased to see that she evidently recognized me, and, better still, that she seemed interested.

"'Who is it, Harry?' I asked. 'I mean the young lady who is talking to your father?'

"'Oh, that's Miss Lawrence,' said Harry, 'a young lady from Chicago, who is spending the summer with her aunt, Mrs. Briggs, one of mother's friends'; and apparently guessing my desire to make her acquaintance, he led the way across the room to where Miss Lawrence stood. I shall not try to tell you what was said, for I don't suppose you would be interested. Indeed it was all quite common-place, but one thing struck me very favorably, charmed me, I had almost said.

"The reception was quite a grand affair, and, as a matter of course, the younger ladies were nearly all in full dress. You know that always makes me tired, and so, perhaps, you can imagine how pleased I was to notice Miss Lawrence's dress. It was as faultless as on the previous occasion —stylish, elegant, though not showy, and perfectly suitable. The dress itself was cut quite low in the neck, but it was worn over another waist of some soft, lacy material, which was gathered about her slender throat, and fastened with a small pearl brooch.

"Don't laugh," as he saw my amazed expression, "I told you I was a crank about a lady's dress. I believe I could give Worth a pointer occasionally.

"But to return to Annie Lawrence. I won't prolong the agony by victimizing you any further. I'll cut my story short and tell you that it was all up with me after that evening. I never tried to smoke but once after that, and then 'it was my last cigar.' I shouldn't have had the face to have asked her the important question till my smoking days were over. And even if her answer had not been what it was, I had thought the matter over, so I know I should never have smoked again. No, sir; I never would ask any woman to marry me to reform me. I reformed before I asked her, and I'm the happiest man alive."

Shall I tell you a secret? Well, I don't smoke either now. There was nothing as romantic about it as there was in Jack's experience. It was simply this, that after a time, in the course of human events, I fell in love myself, and the little woman did not "like the smell of a good cigar." Accordingly I followed Jack's illustrious example and swore off.

We are neither of us millionaires today because we have saved our cigar money, but we are quite as well off mentally, morally, physically, and financially as though we were human chimneys.

Business-like.

Editors, as every one knows, are a very busy set, with no time to waste upon long-winded callers or unnecessary formalities. The Atlanta Constitution cites a typical illustration.

A Georgian editor, who is also a real estate agent, a building and loan association director, an attorney-at-law, clerk of the Town Council and pastor of the village church, was recently called upon to perform the marriage ceremony. He was in a great hurry: in fact, the couple surprised him in the middle of a heavy editorial on the tariff.

"Time is money," said he, without looking up from his work. "Do you want her?"

The man said yes.

"And do you want him?"

The girl stammered the affirmative.

"Man and wife," cried the editor. "One dollar. Bring me a load of wood for it—one-third pine, balance oak."

Hectic.

It was a cheap little clock, warranted to run three years, but it actually did keep on for six and then, one morning, suddenly refused to do its duty longer. It was wound, shaken and then given up in despair.

Another series of efforts disclosed the fact that it would start for a moment, and then stop.

"There!" said grandma, in one of its active intervals, "I think it's all right now."

"Oh, no indeed," said Charles. "It will stop in another minute."

"I don't know about that. It's ticking."

"Yes, but you can tell by the sound that something is the matter. This isn't a good, healthy tick. It's only a stor fo a hectic!"

A PARABLE OF THE SOUL.

Hear ye this parable. A man
Did plant a garden. Vine and tree
Alike, in course of time, began
To put forth fair and pleasantly.
The rails of heaven, the persuading sun
Came down alike on each and every one.

Yet some trees willful grew. And some Strong vines grew gayly in the sun
With gaudy leaves, that ever come
To naught. And yet each flaunting one
Did flourish on triumphantly and glow
Like sunset clouds, in all their moving show.

But lo, the morning found them not!
The soul had perished from them. Seed
And shell and leaf were left to rot,
To furnish nourishment indeed,
To patient tree and lowly creeping vine
That grew as grew the Husbandman's design.

Hear then this lesson, hear and heed.
I say that chaff shall perish; say
Man's soul is like unto a seed
To grow against the Judgment Day.
It grows and grows, if he will have it grow;
It perishes, if he must have it so!

THE TRAIN DISPATCHER.

The office clock ticked with a steady wing, the long pendulum oscilated between the ends of the arc with a monotonous regularity that made one sleepy. The air was damp and chilly outside, only to make the grate a dispenser of warmth and comfort. The constant clicking at my desk relieved the lonesomeness, as I sat with my thumb and two fingers on the key and my eyes on the clock's dial sending the trains in security along the various lines of the road.

The comfort and happiness of men, women and children were intrusted to my vigilant care. The responsibility of the position can only be appreciated by one who is, or has been placed in a similar position. I sat all alone with invisible glances fixed on the network of iron bands, where trains were sweeping over miles of space with lightning speed, while the far reaching throb of electric power came to me from distant stations to locate every movement that guided my unerring judgment.

Every delayed train became an object of concern as it sidetracked for the regular or made up the time between long runs, thus keeping my nerves up to the tension which made life a constant round of duty.

I looked drowsily at the clock, my eyes were heavy with sleep. Oh! for something to rouse me. I walked the narrow space in front of the railing. I opened the door, the cool air blew on my face to bring new life to the sluggish blood that was stealing all my senses. I involuntarily shivered, as the cool breath of night swept through me to make me draw nearer to the fire.

I peered into the glowing bank of coals only to relapse into deeper unconsciousness, when a rap at the door startled me. Glad to escape from the incubus that made me dull, I welcomed the intruder with a bluff.

"Come in."

A rough looking figure stood by my side. The broad-brimmed slouch hat half concealed the fierce look that made me feel uncomfortable as his wild-looking eyes stared steadily into mine. Was the man a lunatic just escaped from the asylum? Insanity was evidently stamped upon the neglected face.

"Are you the operator?"

"Yes; what do you want?"

"Here is a note for you. You dare not refuse the request contained in the letter. You recognize the handwriting?"

I hurriedly glanced along the lines to catch the import. My heart stood still.

"Go! I will be at the appointed place."

I was instructed to see that you did come. I will show you the way."

I glanced at the face, upon which a frigid determined look had settled with a savageness that made me tremble. The letter was before me. Without noticing the remark, I read every line that burned into my brain.

"Wait. I will come.

I arose from my seat glanced sharply at the clock, noted the time, which was propitious, for I could spare an hour without danger, drew on my overcoat and followed the strange man, who seemed entirely oblivious to surroundings as he strode forward with an energy that made walking anything but a pleasure.

I halted and dropped behind a corner; in a moment his clammy, bony fingers were around my throat. I was powerless to resist. A choking sensation made me weak and timid. With a movement that he seemed to understand, the strong grip on my neck was relaxed. Again we strode forward to turn into byways which were unknown to me.

I was betrayed; what was the terrible danger that made my duty a culpable neglect? Already the moments were flying, a chilly sensation swept through every nerve as I thought of the helpless lives intrusted to my keeping; but onward he strode, I could feel the basilisk charm of the bloodshot eyes that resembled coals of fire as they cast watchful glances behind. We halted at a remote house on the suburbs; with a heavy rap he stood waiting for an entrance, while his inhuman expression was intensified by the sickly glare of a single tallow dip, whose dull rays struggled through the dingy panes.

A shuffling gait from within and a cautious turn of the key opened the door to reveal the outlines of a bent figure that shaded the candle with one hand, while a suspicious cunning stare was fixed upon the newcomers.

Without a remonstrance I followed my guide through the rickety passage that ended at a low, wide portal, which was securely closed. Quietly the limping figure drew from the faded cloak a bunch of keys and with extreme deliberation pushed open the door.

The subdued hum of voices reached us faintly as we passed along a narrow, dark way to stand at the farther end until a flood of light almost blinded our eyes. We entered, the door was closed. The low-ceiled room was filled with rough-looking men. Winchesters and pistols were the principal ornaments, as they hung from painted pegs or lay carelessly around within easy reach. A look of astonishment that I could not conceal caused a roar of laughter as they handed my evil genius a flask of brandy and shoved him into one corner, where he was soon lost to the present, as he reclined in a drunken stupor.

"Come, young chap, you see we decoyed you; take a hand just for luck."

"I have no money."

Here is a pile of chips, blue, red and white. You see we sorter thought as how you was lonesum up thar and sent Dick to find you. We will treat you right if you behave yourself. Come make up your ante, you keep the game waiting."

I was fond of poker, but the game was as far from my thoughts as the stars from my present position. I played mechanically; luck smiled in every jack pot. I could not lose. I grew immensely in the estimation of my captors. Every moment was an agony, for I could see what the result of neglected duty would be. I continued to play, the stakes were in my hands.

Rough applause followed every lucky turn of the game. I called for four cards, my opponent did likewise, their hot whisky breaths were on my face. I threw down my hand, four aces, and ended the game.

"Young chap, the money is yours by right, you cleaned us all out; but we will make a haul to-night that will be worth something."

I sat upright, the whole truth flashed upon me—a train robbery. I located the very spot—what a fearful sacrifice of life; oh! what horror numbed me.

"Young chap, you can find your way back the best you can; for the damage has been done by this time." As he spoke he drew a watch from his pocket and stared fixedly at the face. I stole a glance, his time was fast. I scarcely breathed; it might not be too late.

I stood alone in the deserted street, a hack moved slowly by, I sprang to the seat and thrust a $5 bill into the driver's hand. "Drive for your life to the depot." He cast one glance at the money, the horses were in a mad gallop as we whirled by corners with a recklessness that was dangerous. The hack drew up at the entrance. I sprang from my seat and flew to my room.

The fire had gone down; the room was chilly; I awoke with a start and with a horror-stricken face I noted the time, twenty minutes to twelve; cold beads of perspiration stood upon my forehead. Just twenty minutes to avert a disastrous accident.

I staggered to the instrument; but one station between mangled limbs and safety. If I can hold No. 4—If I can hold No. 4. I sounded the call with an eagerness that was startling; with my eyes on the clock I pressed the button down with a hopeless despair, and yet no answer. The time was almost up—five minutes more and it would be too late.

I closed my eyes to see visions of two trains that were masses of torn and shattered splinters. I could even hear the groans of the wounded and dying. My heart gave a fierce beat of joy—"Hello, what in the—is the matter?" "Side track No. 4 quick, for God's sake," and none to soon, as the lightning express swept by like a whirlwind.

I looked into the glass, my hair was as white as a snow bank.

I never touched the key again.

Tennis in a Nutshell.

Now that lawn tennis is again to the fore and the courts are being clipped and rolled and prepared in every direction, the usual old questions come up: "Does any one know the exact dimensions of a court?"

"Where has the manual gone we had last year?"

"Johnny, run over and ask Mr. So-and-So if he remembers the size!" etc.

We therefore advise our readers to cut out the following paragraph from the Tribune and put it in some convenient pocket-book, assuring him that the knowledge will not come amiss.

The court is 78 feet long and 2 feet wide, the net dividing its exact center —the post for which should stand 3 feet outside of the court on either side. The height of the net should be 3 feet 6 inches at the posts and 3 feet in the middle.

At each end of the court and parallel with the net and 39 feet from it are drawn the base lines, the ends of which are connected with the side lines. Half-way between the side lines and parallel with them is drawn the half-court line, dividing the space on each side of the net into two equal parts, the right and left courts. On each side of the net, at a distance of 21 feet from it and parallel with it are drawn the service lines.

Characteristics of American Men.

The following comparison is from Fanny Kemble's memoirs: "You ask me if American men are like the English. No; American gentlemen are a cross between the English and French men, and yet really altogether like neither. They are more refined and modest than Frenchmen, and less manly, shy and rough than Englishmen. Their brains are finer and flimsier, their bodies less vigorous and robust than ours. We are the animals, and they are the subtler spirits. Their intellectual tendency is to excitement and insanity. I think American women, compared with others, deficient in natural animal love of offspring. I think many things in their climate, education and modes of life produce this result. Morally and intellectually they are very good mothers, but not physically, and they and their children are the worse for it."

Edison on Dress.

Mr. Edison has some singular ideas regarding dress. He says: "I wear the same thickness of outer garments the year round. I never wear an overcoat. It is big, heavy, clumsy and of little value as a protector against cold. The air can get in under it in a number of places. I increase or decrease the number of my under-garments, according to the temperature. Every morning when I get out of bed I open the windows of my room and try the air. If it is warm or mild I put on one under-shirt; if cold I put on two, and if very cold I put on three. I was down in the mountains of New Jersey one winter with a number of men and proved that my ideas were good. The thermometer was 15 degrees below zero, and they who wore heavy overcoats almost froze, while I, with no overcoat and a thin summer-weight suit of clothes over three heavy flannel undershirts was as comfortable and chipper as if I had been in some flower garden, in a sunny, warm climate. You see an undershirt hugs you tightly, doesn't allow any heat to escape, and yet doesn't confine you as an overcoat does."

"August Flower"

"I inherit some tendency to Dyspepsia from my mother. I suffered two years in this way; consulted a number of doctors. They did me no good. I then used your August Flower and it was just two days when I felt great relief. I soon got so that I could sleep and eat, and I felt that I was well. That was three years ago, and I am still first-class. I am never without a bottle, and if I feel constipated the least particle a dose or two of August Flower does the work. The beauty of the medicine is, that you can stop the use of it without any bad effects on the system. While I was sick I felt everything it seemed to me a man could feel. I was of all men most miserable. I can say, in conclusion, that I believe August Flower will cure anyone of indigestion, if taken with judgment. A. M. FOR A FOREIGN MARKET

VIEWS OF A LARGE EXPORTING MERCHANT.

American Resources and American Commerce Ready to Contest the Foreign Market—Protection an Obstruction—Export Trade Hurt by the Tariff.

Mr. Ulysses D. Eddy, a member of one of the largest exporting firms of New York City, shows in The Forum that the prophecy of Richard Cobden, the merchant statesman of England, is about to be fulfilled. Cobden warned his countrymen more than fifty years ago that a nation was growing up on the North American continent which, through the unequaled natural resources of its land and the intense energy of its people, would supplant England in the primacy of the world's commerce.

Our exports of manufactured products are as yet far behind those of England. Last year our total exports amounted to nearly 900,000,000, of which only somewhat over 150,000,000 were manufactures. On the other hand, the exports of Great Britain amounted to more than 1,500,000,000, of which more than 1,000,000,000 were manufactured goods, the product of British factories.

There are signs, however, that our country is awakening to the fact that there are possibilities of an enormous commerce with the 1,300,000,000 outside of their own boundaries. Americans are turning their attention to the markets of these vast populations, more than 1,000,000 of whom are not actively engaged in manufacturing. There are signs that we are about to enter upon a friendly warfare for the possession of those vast markets, and there are elements of strength in the American character that will make victory probable.

The vividly energetic character of the people, educated in activity by a commerce unobstructed over a continental area, gives promise of a momentum hard to resist. The American celerity of thought and tendency to prompt action, the spontaneous ingenuity in adapting means to ends, in seizing every new discovery and elaborating it for the uses of man with bewildering swiftness, all make for continuous and rapid progress.

The present great development of our commerce and its extension in foreign countries are not looked upon by Mr. Eddy as the outcome of protection. On the contrary, in stating the disadvantages under which we have hitherto labored, he says:

"For many years we have not only failed to fight for foreign trade, but we have defended ourselves behind tariff fortifications against the attacks of other nations." This view of a shrewd, practical merchant, who has minutely studied the markets of the entire world and has sold goods in them for years, effectually disposes of the absurd pretension of Senator Aldrich that protection promotes foreign trade.

Mr. Eddy indorses reciprocity, but only as a temporary step; "in beginning the campaign for the world's trade, we first throw up outworks around neutral markets in the shape of reciprocity treaties." There will come however, a great advance upon the timid policy of reciprocity. "After operating for a time in the shelter of the reciprocity breastworks, our people may discover that these breastworks hamper rather than help them in a further advance. They will learn how much the enemy fears them, and, gathering courage, will move out into the open field of the neutral markets. The struggle there will be a severe one, but it is difficult to see how, with our resources, we can fail of ultimate success."

There are great and promising markets awaiting us in foreign countries, if we will but cast off our tariff shackles. "The new commonwealth of Australia, the greatest consuming nation in the world in proportion to population, has always preferred quality to cheapness, and is one of our best customers. Whenever our people are ready to admit her wool duty free, we can rest assured that she will grant a generous trade equivalent. British South Africa has long bought many goods from the United States, but asks free entry for her wool before she will grant us favors. Her ports are the gateways to the great African gold fields and diamond mines. Her railways are pushing for the heart of Africa, and already reach long distances from the coast."

Such are the views of a man who is selling American manufactures all over the world, who knows the wants of those markets, and what Americans can sell in them.

Hon. William J. Coombs, M. C., who is the head of the great exporting firm of which Mr. Eddy is a member, has pointed out how our exporting trade is crippled by the tariff in making it difficult for ships which take away our manufactures and farm products to get return cargoes in foreign lands. In an address before the New York Reform Club, of which he is a leading member, Mr. Coombs said, nearly two years ago: "In order to run ships, either sail or steam, at a profit, there are two things that are certainly necessary, viz., outward cargoes and return cargoes. * * The owner of a vessel who charters it for a voyage to Buenos Ayres or the Cape colonies does so with no expectation of getting a return cargo to this port, but calculates upon taking one from there to Europe. If he wishes to return to this country he must, except under unusual circumstances, come back in ballast. His rate of charter is fixed upon this basis. * * Our house has repeatedly within the present year chartered vessels in foreign ports to come to this country in ballast in order to take away merchandise for which we had orders. At the present moment we have six such charters pending. This not only involves long delays but enormously increases cost, and for both reasons puts us at a great disadvantage in comparison with our European rivals."

Who Gets Protection's Plums?

Robert P. Porter, our Superintendent of the Census, who ought to have some knowledge of statistics, has assured the farmers that they get more benefit from protection than any other class. How any man could make such a statement in view of the enormous fortunes accumulated in protected industries, cannot be explained except upon the the theory of willful and wanton purpose to deceive.

Farmers themselves know very well that they have not been made prosperous by protection. National Lecturer Willitts, who was the Alliance candidate for Governor of Kansas last year, has recently shown that he is under no delusion as to the condition of the farming class. He cites the following figures to show how the farmers have fallen behind in the struggle for existence:

"Our last census shows that the farm mortgaged indebtedness of Kansas is $199,000,000, and of Michigan $180,000,000. To pay the interest on the mortgaged indebtedness in the wheat-growing State of Michigan requires 450,554 bushels more wheat than the State produces. Iowa has $199,000,000 mortgaged indebtedness—a sum equal to $104 for every man, woman and child in the State.

"In the last year the farmers in Kansas have lost their homes at the rate of 500 per week, and all the desirable public land is now in the hands of railroads or of aliens.

"In 1850 the farmers owned 70 per cent. of the wealth of this country; in 1860 they owned 50 per cent.; in 1880 they owned 33 per cent.; in 1890 they own less than 25 per cent."

How Many Are Protected?

In 1886 the Secretary of the Treasury, the late Daniel Manning, in preparing his annual report applied to three of the most skillful and expert statisticians in the Government service for an estimate of the number of people in the United States engaged in gainful occupations, grouping separately those subject to foreign competition and those who are not. These three specialists were Worthington C. Ford, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the State Department; E. B. Elliott, United States Government Actuary; and Prof. Simon Newcomb, Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, published by the Navy Department.

The result of their calculations, separately conducted, was that the number of persons in any way subject to foreign competition, were stated as follows, with their percentage to the entire number engaged in gainful occupations:

	Number.	Per Cent.
By Ford	827,184	4.70
By Elliott	825,000	4.75
By Newcomb	905,000	5.29
Averages	852,390	4.88

The percentages given are, each based upon a slightly different estimate of the total number of workers.

Stating the result in the rough, then, we may say that about 850,000 of our people are directly interested in protection, and that per cent., or nineteen out of twenty, have no interest whatever in it. Whenever the protectionists try, therefore, to persuade these nineteen men that they will be ruined, unless they tax themselves for the benefit of the twentieth man, they are guilty of an absurdity which ought to move an owl to mirth.

These figures, given forth with the authority of the men best fitted to speak on the subject, should give the farmer some light on the venerable "home market theory." If nineteen farmers were asked by some twentieth man to tax themselves for his good, and he in return would buy all his corn, flour, vegetables and meat from them, they would laugh him out of the country. They would say at once that a one-man-power home market was far too small to be of any value to nineteen thrifty farmers, and certainly such a market was not worth taxing themselves for—they would even give it up entirely rather than tax themselves.

Yet it is on precisely such a flimsy basis as this that the protectionists rest their case. They ask the nineteen to pay higher prices for what the one makes, and then he will return the favor by buying from them—but of course at current market rates.

A New-Fangled Protection Theory.

The protectionists profess to hate theories and theorists, but they are now so badly rattled that they have become great theorists themselves, and some of their new theories are amusing enough. One of their latest is that we must put a high tariff on foreign goods, not in order to keep those goods out of the country, but in order that we may buy all the more of them. Senator Aldrich put forth this theory at the great protection banquet in New York, and already the high tariff organs are taking to it as a restful variation upon the old familiar theory of keeping up a high tariff in order to shut out foreign goods.

The Boston Boot and Shoe Recorder has so much confidence in the new theory that it even ventures to apply it to Mexico, as follows:

"We know from our own experience that just in proportion as our industries develop we have the means for buying more foreign goods, and we find that our imports are greater per capita after thirty years protection than they were previous to 1861 with a low tariff. The same will be true of Mexico. They have a tariff that is excessively high on many articles, but it is operating to develop industries there, and in addition to this is the steadily growing demand from this country for the tropical products which Mexico has in such abundance. The Mexican people must therefore gain rapidly in wealth, and their imports from other countries will increase in proportion."

This means that Mexico must keep up a high tariff in order to become rich enough to buy our goods, and yet the Recorder wants reciprocity with that country—i. e., wants Mexico to lower its duties on our goods, in order that we may sell more there. What a base jewel of inconsistency!

Against this new-fangled theory the great and only McKinley himself must be quoted. In his speech introducing his high tariff bill he said:

"There is not a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, there is not a member of the minority of that committee, there is not a member of the House on either side, who does not know that the very instant that you have increased the duties to a fair protective point, putting them above the highest revenue point, that very instant you diminish importations, and to that extent diminish the revenue. Nobody can well dispute this proposition."

Certainly not; you are right for once!

The Price of Beef.

Some extremely silly McKinleyites have pretended to see in the increased price of beef another of the many "beneficiencies" of the McKinley tariff law. But men who seek for facts rather than political illusions know that the poor yield of food crops last year is the cause of the higher price. A confirmation of this fact is pointed out by the Rural New-Yorker as follows: "A good illustration of the shortage of cattle foods in the country is given in the prices paid for by the products of rice manufacturing. A year ago rice polish sold at $12 to $14 per ton with rice-bran at $7 to $8. The polish now sells at $22 and the bran at $17 in the New Orleans market."

Farmers who bought corn last winter to feed their cattle will not be deceived by this "I-told-you-so" of the protectionists, when they say the McKinley law has raised the price of beef.

By the way, the McKinley law was not going to raise the price, we are told, of a single necessary of life. And by the way again, the McKinleyites always tell the farmer that the high duties on manufactured products always lower prices, and thus help the farmer; then they face about and tell him that the higher duties on farm products raise the prices of these and thus help the farmer again.

When the McKinleyites are guilty of such absurdities, blowing hot and cold with the same breath, need they wonder that the farmer is losing faith in their sincerity, and is coming more and more to look upon protection as the cheap humbug that it is? If protection reduces the price of nails and axes, the farmer cannot be brought to believe that it raises the price of beef and corn.

TIN PLATE PROMISES.

THE INFANT INDUSTRY OF THE M'KINLEYITES.

Brilliant Promises and How They Have Been Kept—Four Tin Plate Mills—What the Tin Plate Tax Will Cost—Figures and Facts to Consider.

The large and brilliant promises of the McKinleyites last year as to the rapid development of our infant tin-plate industry have not been realized. What those promises were may be seen by the following extract from the speech of Congressman Bunting, a prominent canner of New York State, at the recent meeting of the National Canned Goods Packers' Association at Chicago. In speaking of the canners' hearing before McKinley's committee in March, 1890, Mr. Bunting said:

"Our unanswerable arguments were offset by the most flattering predictions and promises concerning the future of domestic tin plate. The Chairman of the committee [Mr. McKinley] ventured the assertion that before the law went into effect, July 1, 1891, American tin plate could be bought cheaper than the foreign plate was then selling, and that in the interim the consumers of plate could buy the foreign article as cheaply as ever. Mr. Bayne, a member of the committee, professed himself entirely willing to take orders for future delivery on that basis. Mr. Bayne lost his temper in an effort to show that within thirty days after the passage of the bill, forty factories on a basis of millions each in capitalization would be undermining the Welshman at his favorite pursuit of making tin plate. The prediction of Senator Allison that thirty reputable firms engaged in the iron industry would within thirty days put up tinning stacks and manufacture tin plate was flung at us for our composure."

Now, how have these fine promises been kept? The Metal Worker, a prominent trade journal, entirely in sympathy with the effort to build up the infant tin-plate industry by the high McKinley duty, has just collected all the information available as to the new tin-plate works; and all it can find, which are actually engaged in making plates, are just four, with four others in course of erection. Of one of the most pretentious concerns now making tin-plates—that of Norton Brothers, in Chicago,—the Metal Worker says: "It will take considerable time for them to develop their tin-plate plant to a sufficient extent to meet their own requirements."

It is learned from a different source that another of the four mills, ex-Congressman Niedringhaus' St. Louis Stamping Company, does not offer any plates for sale, the entire output being used by Niedringhaus in his own establishment and in sending specimens around to Republican banquets and conventions and to the offices of high tariff newspapers.

Meantime, what is all this tin plate noise costing the country? Our entire imports last year were 674,000,000 pounds, valued at $20,746,000, or 3 1-10 cents per pound, and paying a duty of $6,746,000. The McKinley duty on the same quantity next year will amount to $14,822,000. But our imports this year will be considerably above 800,000,000 pounds, and the McKinley duty on an equal quantity imported after July 1 will amount to $17,600,000.

A high tariff paper, the Boston Commercial Bulletin, calculates that it will require 280 mills, with a capital of from $4,500,000 to $5,000,000, to make all our tin plates. The consumers are therefore to be compelled to tax themselves $17,030,000 a year in order that a few capitalists may find a place to invest $5,000,000.

Are we not going to pay too much for our tin whistle?

Don't Want Our Eggs.

The protection comedy is becoming highly amusing. Last year McKinley put a duty of 5 cents a dozen on eggs—a duty aimed mainly at the pauper-laid eggs of Canada; and now it is announced that Canadian farmers want a duty on American eggs. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, Canada imported 659,051 dozen of eggs, valued at $91,773. Of these eggs the United States supplied 625,166 dozen, valued at $89,444.

It would add greatly to the mirth of the melancholy to get the Canadian farmers to give their reasons for wanting a duty on our eggs, get similar 'reasons' from McKinley for his 5-cent duty on Canada's eggs, and then print these side by side.

Getting Neptune Down Fine.

An apparatus for measuring the mean level of the sea has lately been invented at Marseilles. It is based on the principle that when a liquid wave traverses a capillary tube or a porous partition its amplitude diminishes, and it is retarded in its phases without the mean level of the wave changing.

It consists of a glass tube, the lower end of which communicates by a flexible pipe with a plunger which is lowered beneath the lowest water level. There are two cells in the plunger, the lower being filled with sand and open to the sea, the result being that the column of water in the tube rises and falls very little with the tides, and the mean sea can be read from a graduated scale.

A Pennsylvania farmer tells in the Rural New Yorker his experience of higher prices under the McKinley law. He gives the following case: "Before the McKinley bill was a law, I had some spouting put up at eight cents per foot, complete. Now, under the McKinley protection I had a similar job done, and was compelled to pay ten cents per foot, besides the wages of an extra hand. This shows plainly that for every cent of tariff the manufacturer adds ten cents for profits, and the laborer gets nothing."

If it be true that protection lowers prices, why do the manufacturers always shout so lustily for "more?"

Men like to be coaxed, and women know how to coax. What profiteth a woman to scold.

ENGLISH IN JAPAN.

Sir Edwin Arnold Speaks of the Ethics in Japan.

Sir Edwin Arnold speaks with authority unquestionably upon the ethics of Japan. Others may know more about its arts and history, perhaps, though it must be remarked that the connoisseurs do not agree with one another much. But when it comes to the usages of the people, we should accept the evidence of a poet and a cultured observer, who loves them enthusiastically beyond all others. Sir Edwin states that it is usual for a Japanese shopkeeper in the cities to put up an English translation beside the vernacular upon his side-board. This is certainly curious, and significant. The adoption of our language must be growing indeed when such a custom prevails. The translations are "very comical sometimes," as yet; but that is nothing. In most European ports, those tradesmen along the water's edge who deal in things required by sailors put up an English inscription. The Russians go further; at Cronstadt, for instance, a large proportion of shops throughout the town follow this practice. But Sir Edwin Arnold spoke of Japanese cities in general, apparently, and of tradesmen in general. Furthermore, though this is a slight matter by comparison, "at all railway stations the name of the town or village is written up in both characters." Under such extraordinary circumstances, it is clear that the study of English must be advancing at a great pace. There are not yet so many European residents in Japan, nor so many travelers, that a tradesman should find it really worth while to translate the description of his goods. He must be following a fashion, and in that case we may be sure that he makes an effort to have his children taught English. The result might be grotesque for a generation; but year by year the teaching will improve, if the fashion remain.

HIDING GOLD.

Gold Accumulated in India Never Leaves the Country.

A considerable part of all the gold that goes to India never returns. Having been obtained in the West by the sale of exported productions, it is retained in the East as realized profits, wealth stored up, and, to a moderate extent, for use in the arts; for the rest, as a representative of value on the credit of which traders buy and sell with the bills of exchange they issue and the book credits they open, and settle up the differences with the silver money of the country.

But the vast stock of gold accumulated there undergoes no diminution; there is no ebb and flow under the reciprocal action which commerce enforces in the case of countries trading together on a common metalic basis. The three millions sterling or thereabouts of gold bullion which India annually adds to her store are, under the momentary law of that country, just as much lost to the nations of the West, by being withdrawn from the general commerce of the world, as if the money had been lent to a South American Republic.

Between the years 1835 and 1889 (April) this depletion amounted in value to £130,292,758. Between that date and the month of September of this year a further accumulation to the value of £5,069,272 has taken place, bringing this portion of the gold treasure of India up to a value exceeding £135,350,000.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Racial Odor.

All Indians greatly dislike what they call the white man's smell, and can detect it with perfect ease. "I have," says a Western man, "entered tepees of Utes filled with Indians who had not bathed for a year, and whose aroma rose to heaven, and every one of them would complain of the odor that I brought in with me. The same feeling is manifested by the Chinese, who themselves have a very marked odor that is intensely disagreeable to whites. As a matter of fact, each race has its peculiar odor, which is not perceptible by people of similar origin, but which is plainly noticable by those of different blood."—New York Tribune.

A STRANGE MARRIAGE.

First Mohammedan Wedding Ever Celebrated in England.

The first Mohammedan marriage ever celebrated in England took place recently at the Moslem Institute, Liverpool, where the followers of the prophet in that city regularly assemble. The bride was Miss Charlotte Fitch, eldest daughter of Charles Fitch, J. P., of London, and the bridegroom a Mohammedan barrister practicing in London, whose father is Revenue Secretary to the Nizam of Hyderabad. There was a preliminary marriage at St. Giles', Camberwell. The Vice President of the Moslem congregation officiated, the condition of fitness for such office being a knowledge of Arabic. The Moulvie, as the official is called, was dressed in a long robe of crimson silk, beneath which was a tight-fitting tunic of embroidered black velvet, the whole girdled by a broad gold belt, and wearing a turban of white silk, with streamers which fell over his shoulders. There were two bridemaids. The bride's responses were in English, the bridegroom's in English and Arabic. The lady repeated after the Moulvie the words of the marriage contract: "I stand here, in the presence of God and all who are assembled, to unite my heart to your heart, and my destiny to your destiny, and to be called by your name. Your sorrow shall be my sorrow, your happiness shall be my happiness." The bridegroom made similar promises, after which the Moulvie delivered an address to the newly wedded pair, quoting as exemplars Adam and Eve, and Mohammed and Khadija, Fatima and Ali, as models of conjugal fidelity. After this the bridegroom placed the ring on the bride's finger. The ceremony ended with the inscribing of the names of the contracting parties and their witnesses in the register of the mosque, one of the witnesses being the Ottoman Consul General in Liverpool, and another the Minister of Education for the Armenian Provinces, who had journeyed from Constantinople to assist in organizing the Moslem congregation in Liverpool.

A sociable was given last night at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Marshall for the Presbyterian Church. The lawn was decorated with Chinese lantens while the interior glittered with illuminations. Strawberries, cream and cake were served, as refreshments.

Fr. Arpin holds low mass Sundays, at 9 a. m. when he is here. The congregation is too large for the building, and a new church ought to be built. If the members would celebrate St. John's day and devote the proceeds for the benefit of the church, it would give them a handsome sum in hand. It has been a long time—four years—Since St. John's Day was successfully celebrated here, and no doubt if properly managed a gala day would be made of it. We would like to see our French Canadian friends get up a regular old-time celebration.

The dance at the West hotel Saturday night was undoubtedly the pleasantest event that has transpired here in many a day. It was Miss Elodia Bray's 19th birthday anniversary, and all her friends were there to participate. It was intended as a surprise, but Miss Elodia was too observant despite all precautions. Dancing in the pleasant dining room occupied the first of the evening. The attendance was large and the floor was continually thronged with vivacious dancers. At twelve a delicious supper, consisting of cake, sandwiches, coffee, pickles and ice cream, was served. After all had enjoyed the excellent repast, a general demand arose for vocal music. Miss Louise La Bissoniere first favored the audience. Miss La Bissoniere's voice should be heard more often in Red Laks Falls audiences, as it is far above the average. Miss Martha Gervais sung a sentimental air that evoked hearty applause and general appreciation. L. A. and P. A. Kaufer also gave a couple of songs. The Sabbath having encroached upon the festivities, the party broke up. All united in wishing Miss Elodia many more as enjoyable anniversaries, with her sweet face as unclouded and happy as 'twas then, and thanking the hospitable Brays for so royal an entertainment.

TEN MINUTES TO TWELVE

BY M. G. McCLELLAND.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

into Squire Brandon's carriage for the short drive to the house, where the young lady would change her dress for the wedding journey, a sense of the grotesqueness of his own position touched him, bringing with it a sudden strong desire to laugh, and creating a reaction which restored equilibrium. He had made a mess of it, he was willing to admit, but circumstances had seemed to wall him into a narrow track, along which he had cantered like the most obliging of donkeys. At this stage of the proceedings "hindsight" did little good and was provocative of exasperation, and of reliable foresight he was fain, in all humility of soul, to confess himself destitute. There was nothing for it but to face the situation in the present and endeavor to adjust it with the minimum of pain and discomfort all around. The only solution which suggested itself was to carry out the plan as originally proposed, striving to blunder less in the end than he had done in the beginning. He would take the young lady straight to John Royal, making such explanation to her as would insure her recognition of the love and anxiety for her future which had been the mainspring of a scheme which he now denounced as idiotic.

In the presence of the dying man all personal pique, all womanly sensitiveness, would shrivel and vanish before the majesty of love and the awful mystery of that which was to come. A strange journey it would be, with a strange ending. For the first time came realization of the matter from the woman's standpoint, and with it a great pity for her and a strong desire to shield her from the comment, curiosity and multiplicity of detail to which his story must give rise, at least until this travesty of marriage could be made real by the true man's acknowledgment of it. He would keep his own counsel until he should have given the wife into the keeping of her husband, and then it would be time enough to admit the outside world, to enter upon explanations and self justification.

Arrived at a definite conclusion, he squared his shoulders and put aside that strange sense of irrevocability and personal implication which had oppressed him during the ceremony. In truth, there was little time for thought, less for analysis: the need for action was still omnipresent. He turned to look, for the first time definitely, at John Royal's bride.

As he did so a low laugh startled him, and a hand was thrust out to touch his arm and then withdrawn. It was gloveless, and on the third finger gleamed the marriage ring. She was enveloped in a heavy wrap which concealed her white dress, and her head and face were hidden under folds of soft dark tissue, from which, at throat and crown, the lace of her bridal veil peeped forth, like white clouds under gray ones. Her face was completely concealed, from perverseness of girlish coquetry, he thought, and he could only guess that she was fair because that would increase the pathos of the situation.

Her amusement nettled him, and then a swift sense of their relative position as it must appear to her thrilled through him, producing a jumble of emotions which made chaos of his mind. He longed to put aside the soft gray folds that hid her face, to possess himself of her hand, to speak words which should testify appreciation of the situation—to commit some sort of folly or madness, in short, to prove that he was a man and sentient. What a brute she must think him, he chafed; what a soulless, senseless block of wood he must appear! How could she understand or do him justice, ignorant as she was—and must remain for hours—of the true state of the case? Then he comforted himself with the reflection that when the matter should be made plain to her she would appreciate his conduct.

"Are you tired, John?"

It was the young lady who broke the silence.

"No," he answered, surprised.

It seemed odd to him, at the moment, that the woman should put that question to the man.

"You were so quiet that I had to laugh. It seemed so funny to sit up like two owls, never saying a word to one another," she proceeded. "We are cousins, you know, John, just the same as we used to be. But perhaps you are in pain?"—with a quick change of voice. "Are you? Tell me at once. Ought you to have come? I know it was the money and that foolish clause in the will about today. But for that we might easily have waited until you were strong again. Isn't traveling bad for you?"

"Not at all bad," Royal hastily responded. "On the contrary, it is the very best thing in the world for me—indeed, for us both. I'm much stronger than you suppose." He could hardly restrain a smile as he made the assertion. "The plans must not be changed. We must leave by that 2:20 train. It is imperative that we should. You are ready, I suppose?"

He intended to take her whether she should be or not, but put the question from sheer nervousness. Anything was better than sitting beside her in a state of absolute passivity.

"Oh, yes. My trunks were packed some days ago, and all the arrangements made. You were so explicit—so—so masterful"—with another rippling laugh. "You have not changed in that, John. You love your own way still. Is it not so? But the arrangements need make no difference. We can stay over a day or two to rest if it will be better for you. You will like to see the old place and to visit Aunt Anne's grave. She was so fond of you. We could stop over for that."

But Royal would not hear of stopping over for anything. His private feeling toward the deceased lady was one of distinct animosity. He hoped orthodoxly and vengefully that she might be doing spiritual penance for the trouble and distress likely to be entailed by the acts of her material life, and would gladly have known that she was aware of the miscarriage of her plans and greatly tormented thereby. He generalized for a moment in regard to the old home and the desire to see it which he was expected to feel; but he made it evident that he intended to leave by the first down train.

Unlike brides in general, this young lady appeared docile and amenable to an exceptional degree. Royal, in the midst of his anxiety, wondered over her, and felt the soul within him moved to gratitude. Then his professional experience reminded him that women are usually submissive to the power conferred by suffering. In the eyes of this woman he, perhaps, appeared a wounded hero.

Her next words made evident that such was indeed the case.

"That horrible accident," she murmured, and a quick shudder ran through her frame. "I can't help feeling that half has not been told me—that you have all conspired to keep the worst back and make light of it, in order to spare me pain. You poor fellow! how you must have suffered! It was terrible—a home coming like that, after six years' exile. When I think of it all—of what you have done for me—of what you are doing for me and enduring for my sake—and then think of the anxiety in store for you—for us both—I feel that a lifetime of love and devotion will hardly pay interest on the debt I owe you. Am I worth it to you, John? Will I ever be worth it to you?"

Her voice trembled a little, and Royal had an intuition that she was holding back tears. He felt a sudden stricture of the heart, as though the blood had been drained away. This was not the happy chatter of a girl bride, loving and beloved. Through this woman's voice pulsed an undercurrent of pathos, thrilling its sweetness like minor chords in music. He felt, somehow, that in spite of his best endeavor he was taking unfair advantage of the man who had trusted him, was getting a glimpse into arcana which no stranger unauthorized should penetrate. His pity grew apace, and beside it developed a devouring curiosity, until his very breast seemed strained by stress and complexity of emotion. He yearned to speak to her, but durst not for lack of proper words and an assured position, and so dumbly waited, feeling that if she should continue to talk in that strain during the rest of the drive he could not be held accountable for his actions.

She did not appear to notice his silence or to be hurt by it: perhaps she was in some subtle way conscious of the tension of his mood, or she may have been preoccupied by her own thoughts. For a little space there was silence.

"That old time is so long ago that you can't love me in the old way, John. It isn't possible. There has been so much in your life—change, adventure and quantities of new and interesting people. Not quite in the old way, but enough still to enable me to develop a new and stronger love. They say a love increases with the strain put on it, and in that case yours will grow as compact and firm as the heart of an oak. That's pretty to think of, isn't it?" Then with a sudden change of tone: "It is six years since we have seen each other, John. Just think of it! They say that I have changed very little, and I suppose you would have known me anywhere. Have you changed, I wonder? Let me see."

Royal involuntarily turned his face away and drew his breath hard. This was the moment he had dreaded; for if she should detect the imposture there would be the end of his scheme for sparing her still a little while. And how would it be possible for her not to detect it? She must have had a series of photographs of the other John Royal during those years, pictures that would have chronicled each gradation of change. There was no help for it, however, so he braced his nerves and faced round half defiantly toward her.

The veil still covered her face, and she made no effort to withdraw it. She had taken off her other glove, and her hands lay together in her lap. She seemed to feel that he was bending toward her, that his eyes were on her, and lifted her hands and touched his face and his hair gently and lingeringly with the tips of her fingers. With a suddenness as overwhelming as would be the extinction of light on a fair day, the conviction came to Royal that the girl at his side was blind.

For a moment he was staggered; then came the memory of the sick man's words: "She must not be left to poverty and dependence. She is physically incapable of making her own fight with the world." In the light of this development many things which had puzzled him grew clear. All the nobler instincts of manhood awoke within him. The woman beside him was invested on the instant with a sacredness other and greater than that which had enveloped her as the possession of another man confided to his honor. She was in his eyes set apart as an object of tender care and consideration for all men.

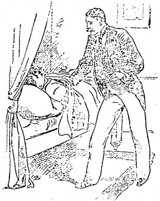
Yielding to the impulse that was in him he clasped the gentle wandering hands in his and raised them to his lips, touching them softly, reverently, as a man might touch the sleeping form of his little child.

CHAPTER V.

The arrangements had been made with care and forethought—the sick man, from his bed in the New York hospital, having been "explicit and masterful," as the bride had laughingly declared. And the good, kind people with whom Phyllis had made her home had aided him to the best of their ability, meeting his wishes half way, and grudging no trouble to which they might be put in furthering them. Royal found, to his unspeakable comfort, that they were to be accompanied as far as Alexandria by a relative of the young lady who had been down in the mountains of Virginia on a visit and had remained over for the wedding. She was introduced to Royal as his "cousin Mrs. Hart," and his liking went out to her at once. There was a largeness in her atmosphere, a sympathy in her fine, intelligent face and frank, cordial manner, to which his nature instantly responded, and he felt that her going with them would be like a crack of daylight along a dark horizon. Perhaps the tide would turn at last and run for a while in poor John Royal's favor. For himself the arrangement would, at all events, bring divided responsibility.

That Mrs. Hart was a widow he surmised from her mourning gown and a certain unattached air about her. His prepossession seemed fully justified by the treatment accorded her on every hand; for young and old clustered around her and persistently ignored the dignity of her conjugal appellation. She seemed to be "Nina" to everybody.

"It will be a comfort being with Nina until you can get a suitable maid for Phyllis," Mrs. Brandon remarked in a motherly way. "The dear child needs a good deal of attention, you know, and some help in dressing. She would never consent to have her pretty hair cut, because she heard you say once that short haired women were your abomination. You wrote about her mammy, but that wouldn't do at all. The old woman is hopelessly rheumatic, and would be miserable if taken away from home. You must have forgotten how old she is. Nina thinks it would be better to get Dr. Tasewell, the oculist, to recommend a woman—somebody you could rely on."



Royal crossed the room and folded back the sheet from the dead man's face.

"She is under treatment." Royal put his query in the form of an assertion.

"The very strictest. And she is so good and patient, so anxious for a cure for your sake as well as for her own. She would not wear anything over her eyes in church this morning. I couldn't blame her, although I scolded her for her vanity, and made her promise to keep the lids closed, and doubled the lace so that one could scarcely distinguish her features. A girl naturally wants to look well on her wedding day—particularly when her lover sees her for the first time in six years. We wrapped her up well, both going and returning, so I don't think she can have taken harm."

The squire, an energetic and impatient old gentleman, speeded the parting in a manner which Royal felt he could never sufficiently applaud. He had fresh horses put to the carriage as it stood before the door, and bustled about and hurried the women with their preparations, laughing and joking with the utmost joviality. This was not farewell at all, he cheerily declared, only that French thing the pronunciation of which he could never remember, and which meant just nothing worth mentioning. The schedule did not admit of extra kissing on the down grade, and the party would certainly be left unless a limit was put to embraces. As for recommendation to take care of Phyllis and himself, he would scorn to name the thing to a man who could defeat death and the doctors, and come hundreds of miles to be married two months after he had been reported broken all to pieces.

So the journey commenced amid merriment and kindliness, and overwrought as he was, even Royal lost sight for a moment or two of the grim fact that through him darkness and death had joined hands.

When he had his charges safe in the car and felt the train in motion he drew a long breath; he was another step nearer the end, at all events. The strain on him was beginning to tell.

Phyllis was in the gayest spirits, and laughed and chatted merrily. Her face was closely covered, the heavy veil doubled across her eyes, for which Royal knew there must be reason, but forebore to inquire into it just yet. He had gathered that the young lady's case was far from hopeless, and the knowledge that it was so brought more relief and thankfulness than his position toward her would seem to warrant. He could realize the intense importance which immediate possession of the money must have had for John Royal—importance so great that he had been willing to risk his life to secure it. It might mean sight to the eyes as well as food and raiment for the body of the woman he loved. It made the conditions of the will more difficult of comprehension than ever, but he forebore to trouble his mind with that question. Other matters were more pressing than could be the solution of an apparently impracticable woman's

SIR JOHN NO MORE.

Canada Loses Her First Minister and the Author of the Canadian Confederation.

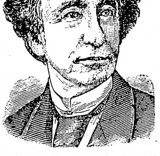
Premier Macdonald Passes Peacefully Away After a Long Struggle With the Inevitable.

Ottawa, June 6.—Sir John Macdonald is dead.

A nation is to-night mourning its greatest statesman, and a great party is in grief for the loss of a beloved leader.

Toward that sick chamber at Earnscliffe public notice has been directed for the last ten days, and the sympathy of the nation has gone out in greater degree as the picture presented grew darker and more pathetic. From all parts of the dominion, and from the sovereign comes a message of condolence. To all of the inquires but one answer could be given—the end might be delayed, but was inevitable.

The beginning of the end came early yesterday morning. The premier had slept the greater part of the night, and through the day he slept at intervals. The afternoon bulletin from the physicians at the bedside announced that the premier's strength was rapidly diminishing, and then all hope fled. As the afternoon slowly waned profound stillness reigned at Earnscliffe. The scene after nightfall was impressive in its solemnity. Up to midnight anxious groups gathered upon the lawn and spoke in whispers of the dying patient's condition.



At 9 o'clock Sir John's heart failed in its work and he sank so low that for some time he seemed to have ceased to live. He rallied feebly and fought his way back to the weakest hold on life a man could have.

HIS STUPENDOUS VITALITY

was making a grand struggle. The light of a new day brought with it nothing to relieve the anxious suspense. There was no change in the patient's condition; he was unconscious. His limbs were numb and there was nothing to mark that life was not extinct, but the feeble fluttering of the pulse and the almost imperceptible breathing. The family had been gathered about the bedside all night. Lady Macdonald, almost worn out by her long vigil, was there, and the premier's son, Hugh J. Macdonald, had kept his place at his father's side.

There was no bulletin from the physicians this morning. Nothing could be said beyond what had already been given out. It was a matter of time, perhaps moments, perhaps hours. The marvelous vitality which was staying the hand of death was slowly but surely ebbing.

The scenes of the morning and the afternoon were but counterparts of yesterday.

At 2 o'clock the physicians concurred in the opinion that the premier could not live until 9 o'clock, and again did they err. The dying premier had been perfectly unconscious for nearly thirty-eight hours, and the spark of life still lingered on.

The members of the cabinet held a long meeting this afternoon, Ministers Dewdney, Powell, Tupper and Costigan afterward called at Earnscliffe for the last report. The action of the patient's heart at times during the eveing was so feeble that Sir John was believed to be dead. Once the family gathered at the bedside under the impression that but it proved to be another of the dreaded sinking spells which, in succession, had left the aged statesman with less and less vitality. Not since 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon had any substantial liquid nourishment passed his lips. Such an unequal struggle could not much longer be sustained.

Eventide found the members of the family gathered about the bedside of the dying statesman waiting patiently for dissolution. Outside in the dusk were gathered the correspondents and small groups of anxious friends. The patient lay unconscious. Nature no longer asserted itself; life's fires were burning low, flickered and smouldered as though the soul would leave its tenement at each successive break. No one would recognize in the dying man one vestige of resemblance to the great political leader who had guided the destinies of Canada for nearly half a century.

At 10 o'clock it was evident that the end was near at hand. The household was summoned to the death chamber. Lady Macdonald stood by the side of her noble husband, and around her gathered the members of the family. Her face showed traces of weary watching and long suspense.

Death came peacefully to the aged premier at 10:15. The pulse fluttered, the breath came shorter and the pulse wa still.

When the announcement of Sir John's death was made the bells of the city were tolled to convey the intelligence to the thousands who were anxiously awaiting this signal that their beloved premier was dead. Lady Macdonald is now prostrated with grief.

The funeral is likely to take place on Tuesday next, and will be of a state character. On that day the body will likely be removed to the senate chamber and lie in state for four or five hours. The interment will subsequently take place at Kingston, Ont., where the premier's first wife and his father are buried.

There has been a suggestion made that the remains of Sir John Macdonald shall be interred in Westminster Abbey, and it has given rise to considerable discussion. Referring to this suggestion the Toronto Telegram says to-night:

> Ottawa is in a sense our political Jerusalem, and enshrined on Parliament hill, a nation's heart, the ashes of Sir John Macdonald would sleep in a noble tomb. The greatness will be secured to generation after generation of Canadians who will go there to honor the memory of one of the founders of a nation that will endure till the resurrection day.

THE DEAD PREMIER.

Mourning for Sir John Macdonald—The Funeral Programme.

Ottawa, Ont., June 8.—Ottawa is the city of mourning to-day. Everywhere are seen signs of the general sorrow felt at the loss the nation has sustained in the death of Sir John Macdonald, one of her greatest sons. Flags are flying at half-mast from the parliament and other public buildings and also many private houses, some of which are draped with crape. The United States flag is floating at half-mast over the United States consulate. The remains of the dead leader were embalmed this morning. Sir John's body is less emaciated than was generally supposed.

The casket in which the remains will be interred is of steel, and painted a beautiful rose color. The massive handles consist of solid bars of oxidized silver, and extend along both sides of the coffin. On the lid are three large silver figures emblematic of the flight of time, in white silk. The outside of the casket is made of solid oak. The inscription on the silver plate has not yet been engraved.

The official programme of the funeral arrangements is as follows: The body will be privately moved from Earnscliffe to the parliament building, and will lie in state there from 1 o'clock Tuesday morning till the hour of the funeral. The state funeral will leave the parliament buildings at 1 o'clock, p. m., Wednesday, for St. Albans' church, and thence to the Canadian Pacific station, whence the body will be conveyed to Kingston. The body will lie in state at the city hall, Kingston, until Thursday noon, when the interment will take place.

Deep sympathy is expressed with Lady Macdonald, and messages of sympathy and condolence are pouring in from every quarter of the globe. In every church in the city to-day lengthy references were made to the deceased statesman. Arrangements have been made to fire minute guns and in every city in Canada on Wednesday afternoon during the funeral. Hundreds visited Earnscliffe to-day and cards were left at the gates. Policemen excluded the general public.

The ex-cabinet ministers met this afternoon, when Sir John Thompson arrived from Montreal, whither he had gone to visit his little daughter, who is seriously ill. It was decided to give the premier a state funeral. Lady Macdonald, on being communicated with, gave her consent to the arrangement.

At this writing the government has not sent for any of Sir John's colleagues to form a ministry.

Queen Victoria to-day cabled to the Governor general that she was deeply pained to learn of Sir John's death, which she regarded as a great loss to Canada and the sovereign. Her majesty extended her heartfelt sympathy to Lady Macdonald in her bereavement. Other dispatches have also been received from Lord Salisbury and scores of other notable persons in England.

It is understood that the government has not yet summoned anybody to form a ministry. Sir Hector Langevin said tonight that certain decencies had to be observed, and that he thought it extremely unlikely that Lord Stanley would take any action regarding a ministry till after Sir John's funeral.

CANVASSING IN TORONTO.

Toronto, June 8.—A quiet canvass is be carried on among prominent Conservatives in this city with a view of discovering how far the accession of Sir John Thompson to the party leadership would be acceptable. The feeling against him on the part of the Orangemen has been found to be of unexpected strength.

Immediately after the announcement of the premier's death last night, all the fire and church bells were tolled, and the newspapers came out with special mourning editions.

NO TIDINGS OF TUPPER.

Sir Charles' Plans or Present Whereabouts Unknown.

London, June 6.—Two or three cable messages respecting Sir John Macdonald's condition have been published daily here. The news was followed with the closest intest throughout the kingdom.

Meanwhile there are no tidings of Sir Charles Tupper's plans. At the high commissioner's office nothing is known. Various inquiries in unofficial circles, where his movements are generally closely followed, had the same result. It is believed that he is still in Vienna, but two other colonial delegates to the postal congress have already returned to London.

Among the many who are acquainted with Sir Charles Tupper's long-cherished desire for the succession to the leadership, the belief gains ground that his present line of action is followed, because it is thought best calculated to stimulate a request from Ottawa to return and assume command.

Whatever may be the issue of the present position of the party, no one here expects Sir Charles Tupper to remain in London many weeks longer.

A Wonderful Cat

A woman asked a Chicago Herald representative a few days ago to come to her house and observe the cunning device of her cat in its war against the rats. The cat, a big tom, was found in the back yard, standing on a box under a tree. The boards around the fence had been cut, and through the aperture the rats were in the habit of emerging. The woman took a bacon bone and threw it into the yard. Immediately Tom got up jumped off the box, and carried it near the hole and began rolling on it and rubbing himself with it industriously. After he had greased himself well he left the bone near the hole, lay down in front of it and appeared to go to sleep.

"Now," said the woman, "he will stay there through the night, and in the morning there will be half a dozen rats laid out around him. You see, the rats smell him if he remains in his natural condition and won't come out, but the grease of the bacon bone deceives them. When he can get a venison bone his catch is enormous, sometimes as many as twelve rats being found dead in the morning. As soon as any of us get up in the morning he will scratch at the door to be let in, and will, by his mewing, induce us to go out to see the result of his scheme.

Rude but Just.

This story of Carlyle and George Gilfillan has recently been put in circulation. The latter author, whose "Literary Portraits," by the way, was a great favorite with the young ladies, was a popular lecturer, and is said to have had a pretty fair appreciation of George Gilfillan. He called one day at Mr. Carlyle's, and his knock was responded to by Carlyle himself. As Carlyle opened the door and stood before him, Gilfillan introduced himself with a grandiloquent bow, and said: "I am George Gilfillan, and you are Mr. Carlyle, I suppose. I have been lecturing about you all over England." Carlyle looked at him half a moment, and then throwing back his shaggy mane blurted out; "What the dickens did you lecture about me for?" and slammed the door in his face.—Exchange.

Almost Starved.

In one way and another we were all frequently reminded of the uncertainty attaching to human judgments. A grown man, in the full possession of his faculties,—as we commonly speak,—certainly ought to know when he is hungry. Yet an experience like the following related by "Taverner" in the Boston Post, is probably not very exceptional:

I was engaged some time ago in preparing an interesting chapter in my new work on the origin and development of the bonnet. I had got as far as the head-dress worn by the Athenian matrons to the theatre, and was naturally much engrossed with the work, when an inward monitor, in a still, small, but yet unmistakable voice suggested "lunch." I looked at my watch—it said three o'clock!

Now I always take luncheon at half-past one, never, in any emergency, later than two. But three o'clock! I fell ill and faint.

I started for the club, feeling like Rip Van Winkle when he came home for his lunch twenty years late. I passed a friend, and tried to slink by without his noticing, but I could see that he looked upon me sadly and askance, as if I were in some way a stricken wether of the flock.

I went in and sat down. Somehow every one else seemed to be late. I looked at the clock it was exactly twenty-five minutes of two. I looked at my watch again. It was still three o'clock. It had stopped during the night.

Now mark the result. I instantly recovered from the starvation from which I had been suffering, and began to converse in my usual cheerful and intelligent manner. But I did not mention the extraordinary behavior of my watch, which I now reveal only in strict confidence.

Street Scene in Montreal.

"I was passing down the St. Lawrence Avenue in Montreal, one cold winter day, says a contributor, when I saw a little tableau, the recollection of which has made me laugh many times since.

"A very courtly, dignified old gentleman, wrapped in a heavy beaver-fur overcoat, was just passing another gentleman, who, from the appearance of his clothing, was in destitute circumstances, but trying to keep up a jaunty bearing, which went down with an ill grace in an atmosphere with the temperature at ten below zero. As the fur-coated gentleman passed, he glanced at the face of the other man sharply, and after taking three steps, he turned around, strode back to the other and touched him on the shoulder, saying very politely:

"'Excuse me, sir, but I think your nose is frozen.'

"'Ah,' replied the other carelessly, 'shouldn't wonder. It very often is.' And catching up a handful of snow from the pavement he began to rub his nose furiously. Then taking off his hat very deliberately, he bowed as if in a drawing-room, and said, 'I am under deep obligations to you, sir. Some time may I hope to be in a condition to return the favor!'

"And the two formal Englishmen parted without having even smiled at the absurdity of the scene."

French and German Bread Laws.

"The laws regulating the manufacture and sale of bread in France are very strict and are enforced with the utmost-vigor," said a prominent bread-maker last month. "The baker is not only required to conform to laws regarding weight, but he is also told at what price he must sell his bread. He is further required to deposit a certain sum of money in the hands of municipal authorities as a surety of good behavior. In the large fortified cities he has to keep a specific quanity of flour on hand to provide for war-like energencies. In Germany laws of similar import are in existence, and are enforced with such relentless severity that no baker ever dreams of defying them. The British law regulates the weight of loaves and makes provision for the cleanliness and ventilation of the bake-shops. The price is left to regulate itself by trade competition. The Ontario act empowers municipalities to engage officers for the prevention of fraud, and clothes them with authority to confiscate all bread found to be of light weight. The bread seized in this way is turned over to charitable institutions for the use of its inmates,"—Baker's Helper.

Preserve Your Vigor.

A healthy, vigorous system resists disease. Worms burrow in decaying trees; not in the young, the vigorous and the thrifty. Some persons can almost defy the deadliest diseases. Others fall before the slightest attacks. Many diseases come from germs, which plant themselves within the body, and then multiply and destroy. If we have the vigor that can resist the first of these little germs, we escape. But if the system is debilitated; if bad food and bad air have impaired vitality; if stimulants, strong drink, sensual and vicious indulgences, excessive strains, idleness or inactivity, have sapped the vigor of the system, then disease lays hold upon the enfeebled frame and works its overthrow. Many a poor fellow whose life is wasting and wearing away with some incurable malady, is only paying the penalty for the excesses of those young days, when nothing he could eat, drink, or do, ever injured him! He had the treasure of health, —he squandered it, and now comes the time of settlement, and he finds that "the wages of sin is death."—Medical Brief.

Papers in that county are now calling on the farmers to hold on to their farms.

SLAIN BY SOLDIERS.

A Terrible State of Affairs in Hayti as the Result of the Rebellion.

Every Man Suspected of Sympathizing With the Rebels Put to Death Without Trial.

Port au Prince, June 9.—The massacre of St. Bartholomew sinks into insignificance beside the scenes enacted here in the last few days.

For the last two or three weeks there have been rumors that a revolution against Hypolite was imminent in this capital, and these having reached the ears of the chief executive, he caused the arrest of about eighty suspected persons, dragged them from their homes and put them in irons in prison.

Among the suspected was a Gen. Sully, who, hearing he was wanted, hid himself. Failing to secure the general himself, his wife was taken instead and thrown into prison.

The outbreak of the rebels occurred on Thursday, May 28. While President Hippolyte was attending church a former cabinet, at the head of eighty followers, stormed the prison and released 200 political and other prisoners. The released prisoners were provided with arms, and when Hippolyte's troops arrived on the scene there was a bloody battle. Hippolyte, fearing that he would be shot down by some of the rebels if he appeared on the street, remained in the church all day guarded by soldiers.

He called out the reserve militia and the rebels were soon routed. The leader of the rebels, the former cabinet minister, whose name the officers of the vessel did not learn, was CAPTURED AND SHOT AT ONCE.

By night of Tuesday forty of the insurgents were captured and put to death. Others were captured and shot on Friday, Saturday and Sunday. Every man suspected of being in sympathy with the insurgents was put to death without trial as soon as captured.

Most of the 200 prisoners released from jail by the insurgents were recaptured and shot.

The outbreak seemed to have been precipitated by the killing of Ernest Rigaud, the largest merchant at Port Au Prince, by the order of President Hippolyte. Regaud, who alleged that he was a French subject, had been in Paris some time and had only recently returned to Hayti. Ex-President Legitime is in Paris and is supposed to be in secret communication with his sympathizers in Hayti.

Rigaud was suspected of being in sympathy with the Legitime party and of aiding it. It was believed that he had brought from Paris a cargo of arms for the rebels. On Thursday morning, May 28, President Hippolyte went to the house of Rigaud followed by a detachment of soldiers.

The soldiers remained outside, while the president entered alone. He asked the merchant if he did not have guns concealed in the house. Rigaud answered that he had no guns in the house. "Then you have them at your store," said the president.

SHOT DOWN IN THE STREET.

The merchant replied that he had no guns concealed anywhere, but it is said he insulted Hippolyte and ordered him out of the house. Putting his hand on Rigaud's shoulder, the president said: "Come with me."

They left the house together and stepped out in front of the waiting soldiers. Without another word to Rigaud, Hippolyte stepped aside and gave the order to fire. The soldiers raised their guns and fired a volley into the body of the rich merchant. He fell dead in front of his house.

Hippolyte no doubt thought this would frighten the friends of Legitime, who contemplated an outbreak, but it seems to have roused them to fury, and the attack on the prison and release of the political prisoners followed in a few hours.

On Saturday morning, May 30, a nephew of Ernest Rigaud, who was associated with him in business, called at President Hippolyte's house to ask about the killing of his uncle. The young man did not know that his uncle was shot by order of the president.

He believed it was done by the soldiers without orders and he intended to demand an investigation. As soon as he addressed the president and stated the object of his visit Hippolyte

ORDERED HIM SHOT.

He was at once dragged into the street by the soldiers and shot dead. The outbreak caused great excitement in Port au Prince, and thoroughly alarmed Hippolyte and his government.

The full military reserve force was called out, the custom house and all public buildings were closed, and no one was allowed to leave the city without a passport from the government.

About the same time Mr. Alexis Rossignol, an inoffensive and much esteemed man, was executed in the streets; another man was put up against the cathedral wall and shot; seventeen were executed in a batch; and, even at this date, an occasional volley tells that another poor wretch has been sent to his doom.

There is no fighting in the streets to excuse this bloody massacre; every execution is carried out in the most cold-blooded way, the executioners being soldiers beloning to the most degraded type of men, who seem to ENJOY THE BLOODY TASK.

Day and night the troops of Hippolyte patrol the streets searching for persons suspected of being in sympathy with the insurgent party. Business is practically suspended.

The bodies of the rebels shot are left lying in the streets for several hours as a warning to their friends. The officers of some of the German vessels in port went on shore to look at the dead bodies.

To-day a grand festival of peace, so-called, is ordered by Hippolyte. The festival is to celebrate the fact that the rebels had been defeated and peace established.

It is impossible to enumerate in detail all the murders that have been perpetrated under the color of law. It is estimated that from May 28 to June 1 300 persons have been put to death.

No one can say how long this state of affairs will last, or what the result will be. Nor can any one who has not been eye witness of the scenes of horror enacted have an idea of the terrified condition of the people of Port Au Prince.

More Rapid Issue.

Washington, June 9.—The commissioner of pensions is making arrangements to further facilitate the issuing of pension certificates, and expects in a short time to issue four hundred more certificates daily than is now being done. During the commissioner's incumbency the number of cases awaiting investigation by special examiners in the field has been reduced from 14,225 to 2,200, and consequently about forty special examiners now in the field will be called in. Gen. Raum said to-day that with the addition of more clerks he expected to make a better record this year than ever before.

SEVENTEEN COUNTS.

Bardsley Liable to Get Eighty-Five Years in Prison.

Philadelphia, June 9.—The grand jury has found seventeen indictments against ex-City Treasurer Bardsley. The maximum penalty is eighty-five years' imprisonment.

Long before the hour set for the meeting of the subcommittee of councils that is investigating the affairs of ex-City Treasurer Bardsley select councils chamber, in which the meetings are held, was crowned to its utmost capacity.

Postmaster General Wanamaker came forward with a large roll of manuscript in his hand. He stated that he, as a taxpayer, had the greatest interest in unraveling the affairs of the Keystone bank. He stated that he had prepared and proposed to read a statement that he had in his hand. The paper was an answer to all the allegations that have connected his name with the Keystane bank, and was at the same time a full and complete statement of all his transaction with the bank.

Mr. Wanamaker's statement, after accounting for all his transactions with the bank and Mr. Lucas, concluded as follows: "In brief, I was a depositor, but not an officer of the bank. I did not know the bank would fail, nor did I delay or touch in any way the appointment of a receiver. I am absolutely ignorant of any transaction with Mr. Bardsley, within or without the bank. Instead of the bank losing a penny by me, I have only been its profitable customer."

Mr. Wanamaker was subjected to a vigorous cross-examination.

Bank Examiner Drew stated that he still thinks that the assets of the bank will be able to pay the depositors dollar for dollar. When asked if he included the $930,000 in due bills held by Mr. Beardsley as among the liabilities of the bank. Mr. Drew said he did not, as there was no trace of the money ever having been put into the bank. He placed the liabilities to depositors at $1,400,000, and the assets at about the same. The assets are $120,000 in money, $770,000 in bills receivable, for which he allows a shrinkage of $170,000 and property at Sea Girt and Spring Lake variously estimated to be worth $500,000 to $800,000.

A meeting of depositors of the suspended Spring Garden National Bank was held tonight. Resolutions condemnator of Bank Examiner Drew with regard to both the Keystone and Spring Garden banks, and calling upon the proper authorities to ask for his resignation at once.

MURDERED BY CHINESE.

Trouble Which May Call for a United States War Vessel.

Shanghai, June 9.—Faesh outrages against foreigners are reported at Wvsteh, near Kin Kiang. An English missionary and a customs officer have been murdered and the European residents are appealing for the protection of a man-of-war. The French and American ministers have called upon the imperial cabinet to give efficient protection to European and American residents, hinting that failure to comply with this request will involve hostile action on the part of their respective governments. The French squadron threatens to bombard Nankin unless the sufferers by the recent riots are promptly indemnified.

Horrible details are given of the attacks at Wusuch on the French missions. Women and children escaped murder only by flying naked from their abodes. Instead of repressing, the provincial mandarins appear rather to encourage the anti-foreign feeling. The epidemic of outrage continues to spread. A dispatch of gunboats by the Chinese government, even supposing it were done in good faith, would fail to arrest the movement.

SCHOFIELD WILL MARRY.

Notwithstanding a Report to the Contrary Published in an Army Journal.

Chicago, June 9.—A special to the Daily News from Washington says:

"The current number of the Army and Navy Journal, which is a semi-official organ of the war department, says: 'We do not publish the Chicago telegram announcing the marriage of Dr. Schofield, as we have authority to state that the reports are absolutely false.' This positive assertion by a semi-official paper which says it speaks from 'authority' is causing much comment in army circles. Many prominent officers insist that the wedding will never take place, and the fact that the general's relatives are in the dark on the matter adds to the uncertainty."

Gen. Schofield was shown the dispatch this evening. "I can see no reason for such a statement," said Gen. Schofield. "The Army and Navy Journal is in no sense an official organ. It has no authority to speak for either the war department or anything or anybody else. It picks up its news wherever it can get it like any other paper. In regard to my marriage there is nothing left to be said. I eave informed my family of my intended marriage.

A TERRIFIC STORM.

Tracks Washed Out and Bridges Carried Away by a Flood.

Hot Springs, S. D., Special Telegram, June 9.—Heaviest rain and hail storms to visit this locality for years burst upon the city suddenly this afternoon and lasted for two hours.

Water poured down in torrents, deluging Minnekahta avenue, one of the principal thoroughfares of the city, to the depth of two feet. Hail stone as large as a man's fist completely demoralized all the northern windows throughout the city, and pounded vegetation into the earth. The railways between Hot Springs and Buffalo Gap is badly washed out. Three bridges are out within ten miles of the city, causing a temporary suspension of traffic.

To Open for Entry.

Des Moines, June 9.—July 6 there will be open for entry in Iowa the unearned forfeited lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the Sioux City & St. Paul, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and the Cedar Rapids & Missouri River Railroad companies, not embraced in selections heretofore made on appeal for said companies. There will probably be about 15,000 acres of these lands opened up for entry, as ordered by the secretary of the interior. A large part of these lands is occupied by settlers, who have been innocent purchasers of the railroad companies, and have made improvements. In cases of this kind the settlers will be given the first opportunity to make entry.

Lava From Vesuvius.

Naples, June 9.—A large stream of lava is issuing from a new crater of Mount Vesuvius at the base of the central cone. Signor Palmieri, the director of the observatory, states that the flow is directly connected with yesterday's earth quake in Lombardy, and that the seismic disturbances generally stop when an eruption commences. He does not consider lava stream dangerous. The fearful subterranean rumblings, followed by heavy earthquake shocks, continue, and the alarmed inhabitants have encamped in tents, hurriedly pitched in the fields far away from the reach of the falling debris.

AMONG THE NATCHEZ.

They are Divided off into two Classes Nobles and Common People.

The Natchez were divided into nobles and common people, which last, with an arrogance not peculiar to savage alone, were designated "stinkards."

The nobles themselves were divided into Suns, nobles, and men of rank. The Suns, according to tradition, were descended from a man and woman who come down from the sun to teach them how to live and govern themselves. They enjoyed immunity from punishment by death, and their nobility was transmitted only through the female line. Although the children, both male and female, bore the name of Suns, the males enjoyed this honor in their own persons alone. Their male children were only nobles; the next generation were men of rank, and the third lowered them to plain stinkards, although distinguished actions might retard the deterioration of the blood. But the case was very different with the female posterity. They enjoyed through all generations the privileges of their rank. Laudoniere speaks of a queen "who was much reverenced by her subjects when he visited Florida."

The nobility never intermarried. As we have already noticed, one of their laws prohibited their being put to death for any reason whatsoever. Another law decreed that when a Sun died, his or her conjugal partner should be put to death at the time of burial. To fulfil these two laws they only married stinkards.—The Popular Science.

The Best Half of Life.

The best half of life is in front of the man of 40, if he be anything of a man. The work he will do will be done with the hand of a master, and not of a raw apprentice. The trained intellect does not see "men as trees walking," but sees everything clearly and in just measure. The trained temper does not rush at work like a blind bull at a haystack, but advances with the calm and ordered peace of conscious power and deliberate determination. To no man is the world so new, and the future so fresh, as to him who has spent the early years of his manhood in striving to understand the deeper problems of science and life, and who has made some headway toward comprehending them. To him the commonest things are rare and wonderful, both in themselves and as parts of a beautiful and intelligent whole. Such a thing as staleness in life and its duties he cannot understand. Knowledge is always opening out before him in wider expanses and more commanding heights. The pleasure of growing knowledge and increasing power makes every year of his life happier and more hopeful than the last.—The Hospital.

A Jewel in a Serpent's Head.

There is a belief current in all part of India that a certain variety of snake called shesh nag, when in attains the age of one thousand years, has a precious jewel formed in its head. The jewel, it is affirmed, possesses the quality of sucking up the poison of the deadlist snake if applied to the wounded part. Strangely enough a Paris gentleman is reputed to possess this invaluable jewel, according to a correspondent of a Gujarati weekly, published at Wadhwan, in Gujarati. The correspondent says that when the present owner—who, by the way, is now sixty-three—was twenty-three years old, he lighted upon a snake of the above mentioned variety, which he killed. Then he found the jewel in his head. It has already saved several lives. When Mr. Vidal, the collector of the district, was there it was shown to him, too. The jewel is said to contain a thin, crescent-like fiber, which unceasingly oscillates in the center. The Galkwar of Baroda, the Maharajah of Kolhapur and several of her natives princes are said to have offered several hundred thousand rupees for this unique jewel. The name of the owner is Mr. Framji Badabbai Govekar, Tarspur, Bombay presidency.—Jewelers' Review.

Norman Humor.

Superstitions about rocks, which were once popular among the peasant classes of Europe, are dying out. The familiar legend is of a rock which, moved at a certain time by some strange witchcraft, revolves or rolls aside, and discloses treasure hidden beneath, the time usually being specially inconvenient for witnesses, as for instance, "on the stroke of twelve on Christmas Eve." A peculiar story of this kind is still told in Normandy. M. Julien Tiersot writes of it in the Revue des Traditions Populaires:

In the neighborhood of Caudbec-en-Caux there is a stone which, the country people say, revolves while the bells ring the Angelus at noon on Good Friday. A walk in the country in the spring at the hour of noon is an agreeable diversion, and the sceptical stranger readily consents to go and see the alleged magical stone.

The stranger and his escort reach the stone and wait. Time passes. It is afternoon.

"But the stone has not yet moved!" he says.

"Wait, you have not heard the Angelus rung yet, for on Good Friday the Angelus is never rung.

Not so Strange.

An astute American woman is said to have remarked upon the astonishing precocity of the children in Paris. "Why," she said, "the little things speak French as early as an American child speaks English!"

The same woman, or another like her, lately remarked, as reported by an exchange:

"I often wonder how people manage to understand each other in France."

"How absurd!" said another woman, rather impolitely.

"I don't think it absurd at all. Both my daughters speak French, and they can't understand each other."

INCIDENTS OF AFRICAN TRAVEL.

Communication with Foreign Servants by Gesticulation Is Amusing.

Tips and gesticulations go a great way in making foreign servants understand those who do not speak their language, but they do not always succeed, and tiresome though amusing adventures are often the result.

When we first traveled in India we knew very little Hindustani, and on arriving at a palatial but very comfortless hotel at Jubbulpore I wanted a small pitcher of hot water to bathe an injury on my little finger. We knew that chola was "small" and garrum "warm," but we could not think of the Hindustani for "water." At last I thought I had made the bearer understand what I wanted. After waiting some time he returned, looking well pleased with himself at so easily guessing my wishes, and, placing a small cup of tea at my side, bowed profoundly, and was about to leave the room when I called him back and tried again to explain.

This time we had to wait still longer, but presently we heard a thumping on the stairs and a deal of gasping and groaning, and then three men appeared carrying a most enormous caldron of boiling water.

Our next journey was to Allahabad, and on reaching the station at dawn we hired a carriage and told the coachman in our best Hindustani to drive to the nearest hotel. We soon stopped at the entrance of a large house and a well dressed European opened the carriage door for us and politely helped us out.

"I am glad you have come so early," he said, "for you will have plenty of time to see everything, and I assure you I can show you some very handsome pieces of furniture. What will you look at first?"

"After traveling all night we are too tired and hungry to look at anything at present," I answered sharply, "but will you show us into the best bedroom you've got and send us some breakfast immediately?"

The man stared at me in utter astonishment and turned to Mr. Ker for an explanation. After a time we found out our mistake. The house was not a hotel but a private residence, and the furniture was about to be sold at auction. The European, whom we had mistaken for the hotel manager, was the auctioneer. So our Hindustani had been again at fault.

In west Africa I twice quite unintentionally offended the natives most grievously. Directly a steamer arrives at a port the negroes swarm around her in canoes, offering skins, grass mats, etc., for sale, and I always took this opportunity of sketching them. Once one of the men wore a very extraordinary wig, and in my anxiety to have a good look at it I must have let my drawing block and pencil be seen, for he caught sight of what I was doing, and tearing off his wig in terror he called out wildly:

"No put me in book, white mam!! M good man! No put me in book!"

He evidently thought that I was working some evil spell over him.

Another time an Ashantee woman on our steamer saw me sketching her, and she complained most bitterly to the captain that I had made her very ill. She said that I had given her a frightful pain in her head, and that she had to lie down all the afternoon.

But I think the funniest thing that ever happened to me was at Old Calabar. We had sent our clothes to be washed there and when the washerwoman brought them back she coolly told me that she had kept one or two of my garments, for she liked them so much that she could not part with them. She asked me what she should give me for them. I told her I could not possibly sell my underclothing as curiosities. However, she got them for nothing, for our steamer was just sailing for England, so I had no means of insisting upon their return.—Mrs. David Ker in Epoch.

He Didn't Mind.

A good story is told of Bay Middleton, whose name in England is a household word for jokes and escapades of all kinds. It seems that in the house was a guest who, for some reason, did not bring a smoking jacket with him, and committed the heinous offense of appearing in the smoking room in a dress coat. Bay Middleton vowed vengeance against him, and promised him that if he repeated the offense he would tear the coat from his back. The following night the man appeared in the smoking room very late, wearing, as usual, his evening coat.

He took his position before the fireplace, with his arms on the mantelpiece, gazing contemplatively into the fire and presenting his coat tails in a tempting fashion to Bay Middleton. The offer could not be refused, and Bay seized the coat tails and split the coat up to the collar. The victim never moved or said a word. The joke seemed to fall flat. Some one asked he of the split coat why he did not make any objection, upon which he said:

"Why should I? As I came down stairs I went into Bay's room and put on his evening coat."—New York World.

German Stoves.

The old Germans, themselves almost as ancient as the Romans, made the first metal stove. It was on the outside of the house to be warmed. But while that may seem like a curious place to put your stove your smiles may vanish when you are informed that one end of the stove projected into the room. The firing was done on the outside, and it must have been a most unwelcome thing indeed then to get up first in the morning and start a fire in the stove. The ashes were taken from the bed without being scattered over the carpet, and the business end of the contrivance which reached into the room did all the good our present stoves can accomplish, excepting that they lost more heat than do these.—Chicago Herald.

The Tallest German Soldier.

Until quite lately, Captain Pluskow, of the First regiment of Guards, had been considered the biggest man in the German army. He measured over eighty inches in height. But a short time since a young Rhinelander joined the Fifth regiment of Foot Guards, as a "one year's volunteer," who attains the colossal height of over 7 feet 4½ inches. Since 1850 the First regiment of Guards has not had so tall a man. At that time they had a man who was so tall that everything, even his bedstead, had to be made especially for him. His accoutrements are preserved still among the curios of the regiment.—Leisure Hour.

An active poison is present in stale milk, cream and cheese, and is known as tyrotoxicon. It has been found in sweet milk not properly cooled, in oysters stewed with milk, in cream puffs and in old cheese, thus directly pointing to its habitat in milk. In most instances illness has been traced to some such condition as the mingling of milk over a day old with that newly drawn, the use of milk or cream over twenty-four hours old, the use of utensils imperfectly cleaned, the use of milk kept in damp, ill ventilated places.

An Informal Wedding.

A remarkable tale of an "informal" wedding is related by a clergyman who was for some time settled in a small town in western New York. The father of the bride invited the minister to spend the evening at his house, and, incidentally, to marry his daughter. He asked at what time the ceremony was to be performed, but was told that it was not yet decided; the whole thing was to be very informal, and the minister had better plan to spend the evening, as they had arranged to have a "grand good time."

I presented myself at his house, therefore, early in the evening, and found a large company assembled. The young people were playing games in one room, while their elders chatted socially in another.

As the evening wore on music had its part in the festivity. The bride elect "performed" on the melodeon, while the future partner of her joys exerted his energies upon the flute.

Ten o'clock came, and when the host genially invited every one out to a "spread in the dining room," I began to think that possibly they had changed their minds and the wedding was not to take place after all. But as I stood rather irresolutely, wondering what was expected of me, the host took me by the arm and led the way into the dining room. He placed me at the head of the long table, while the bride and groom were seated at my right and left.

All hands were busy with the good things with which the table was heaped, when the host, who had been hovering about the company instead of sitting down, whispered in my ear, "I guess this is as good a time as any."

Then he added, aloud, "Stand up, Mary and John!" And surely they did stand up, and I performed the ceremony, with one of the "contracting parties" on one side of the table and one on the other, their hands being joined over a dish of excellent baked Indian pudding, which had the place of honor before me.

As soon as I had pronounced the pair husband and wife the groom left his seat, and going around to the bride's side of the table, gave her a hearty kiss, after which he returned to his own seat and renewed his attack upon the supper.

I have had queer experiences at other weddings, but never one where I felt the absurdity so keenly as on this truly "informal" occasion.—Youth's Companion.

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

there had been nothing to arouse the suspicion of his companions or make them doubt his sincerity. To them he was the master of the situation, the grand male creature who had just proved possession of manhood and puissance to an unprecedented degree. They hearkened to him graciously, and treated him with the subtle suggestion of trust and dependence which is spontaneous with all womanly women. After a little the talk, insensibly guided by Royal, drifted to serious things, and he told them, as of a strange and pitiful happening, of his meeting on the train the day before with a poor young fellow, ill unto death and in sore trouble. He told how he (Royal) had noticed him fainting in his seat, and, being a physician, had gone to him to do what he could, and then had discovered that the sick stranger had a claim on his care, being a brother Mason. He spoke of the interest which this discovery had aroused, and of how it had deepened in view of the other's courage and patience, and of how he had been obliged to leave him at last in the strange hotel, without friend or kinsman near, fighting his battle with the grim destroyer alone. He made a little story of it, and gave it to them as simply as he could, hoping to arouse their interest and sympathy. And they asked questions in hushed voices, and were sorry in a sweet impersonal way, as women will be over tales of sorrow.

"Did you find out his name?" Mrs. Hart inquired.

Royal replied in the affirmative. That was the reason he had troubled them with the story, he explained, thinking they might help him, perhaps, since they must spend the night in the very hotel where the sick man lay. The name was the same as theirs—Royal. He might be a kinsman. Who should say?

"Might!" repeated Mrs. Hart, her interest all aflame. "Why, of course he is a kinsman; he must be. All the Royals are related, and Virginia is full of them. How very strange, your meeting him that way! I wonder to which branch of the family he can possibly belong."

Phyllis also manifested interest and concern about this "stranger cousin," as she dubbed him. But her mind appeared to dwell most on Royal's own share in the business, and she whispered sweet words of commendation in a low voice which thrilled through Royal, who had not sought to produce this effect, and made him more bitterly conscious than ever what a tangle the matter had become.

Meanwhile Mrs. Hart appeared to be mustering all the Royals, dead and alive, who had inhabited the commonwealth in the past or were inhabiting it in the present, in her efforts to satisfactorily place this new Royal.

"You don't know his Christian name, I suppose?" she observed, and then saved him from a dilemma by answering herself, "No, of course you wouldn't think to inquire at a time like that, and in such a hurry as you must have been, too. Still, I wish I knew it. A Christian name nearly always locates the branch. It's apt to give an intermarriage."

After a moment of reflection, during which she fastened this scion to every Virginia root of the Royal tree and plucked it away again, she continued meditatively:

"There was a Royal who went west when I was a child. His name was Philip, which is a family name in both gen[illegible]rs. He married Pauline Hart, a first cousin of my husband's, and a sister of that very John Hart to whom Anne Royal was engaged. I wonder if this young man could be Phil Royal's son! You must find out, John, because if he should be he is doubly related to you two, and also a close connection of my own. How strange and romantic it would be! Just think of it, Phyllis! The nephew of your aunt's old lover, and for John to have met—nay, more, to have befriended—him on his way to be married to you on the fiftieth anniversary of that which was to have been Anne's own wedding day to John Hart! I never in my life heard anything like it!"

Nor had Royal. He had wondered why such stress had been put on the 28th of December. He understood it now for a woman's sentiment about the day which was to have crowned her own love story with fruition. As much trouble as this sentiment had already caused him, and was likely to cause him in the future, he had no impulse to mock at it. He was too real a man to be devoid of reverence for romance.

When they plied him still with questions he said that he did not believe that the sick man came from the west; he was convinced that he must be a native born Virginian. A whimsical thought would obtrude itself relative to the greatness of their bewilderment when they should be confronted with the necessity for transposing his identity with that of the other John Royal. He himself was the son of Philip Royal and Pauline Hart.

When they reached their destination Royal hurried them to the hotel, secured rooms and established them comfortably. Then he left them to see after his patient, he said, and to attend to other matters. Mrs. Hart followed him into the corridor to say that if there should be any service for the sick man which she could perform, he must not fail to let her know, and both ladies bade him send them news of the poor fellow's condition.

Royal walked down the corridor with a step quickened by anxiety. He had hurried the ladies in, not daring to make inquiries in the office nor to interrogate the servant. The hotel people were aware that he had gone for the sick man's friends. He had himself informed the proprietor of his intention, explaining the impossibility of immediate communication with them by telegraph. The ladies under his charge would be received as appertaining to John Royal.

At the door of the sick room he paused to compose his countenance, and to shake off, if possible, the weariness which oppressed him. Then he opened it and entered.

The shutters had been closed and there was no fire in the grate. The outside air entered freely, but it could not dispel the strange odors in the room; about the place there was a look of neatness that was unmistakable; every chair was in place, and the white covering of the bed hung straight and smooth over the sharp outlines of that which lay beneath.

Royal crossed the room and folded back the sheet from the dead man's face. It was very peaceful, with all the lines of care and pain smoothed out, and that strange reflection of a light that never was on land or sea touching and brightening the still features into a look of youth, a look of hope. Royal replaced the covering with a pain at his heart which his brief acquaintance with the dead man would hardly justify. It was as though a part of his own life had been suddenly swept into the infinite. That silent form would be a barrier forever separating his future from his past.

He touched the bell.

It was answered almost immediately by a colored man, one of the hotel waiters, whom he in the urgency of the case had installed as nurse that very morning. How long ago it seemed looking backward through the full hours—the hours so few in number, so plethoric with events, so pregnant with change which would affect his whole life! It almost seemed as though an ordinary lifetime must have intervened since he had given his hurried directions to the man now standing before him. He pointed toward the bed.

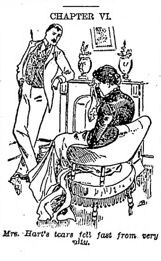
"When did it happen?" he inquired.

The man, a civil and intelligent fellow, stepped to the bureau and brought the dead man's watch. "'Twas mighty easy an' peaceful at de las', sar," he said, as he handed it. "He suffered mightily arter you lef', an' t'other doctor he look like he couldn't give him no res'. 'Twa'n't in his limbs, sar—all feelin' had gone out'n dem; 'twas in his body an' back. Den de inside hemo'ages come on an' he sunk rapid, an' at las' jus' drapp'd off like a chile gwine to sleep. De doctor had got 'feared an' gone for 'nother doctor or somebody, so t'wa'nt nobody wid him 'ceptin' me an' Lucy, the 'ooman what waits on dis passage. I 'lowed you mout be partic'lar 'bout de time, bein' a doctor yo'se'f, an' my mem'ry ain't good like it used to be, so I jus' stopped his watch arter breath had lef' him good."

Royal opened the watch in his hand. It had been stopped at ten minutes to 12.

He replaced it on the bureau, and signed to the negro to leave the room. Then he sat himself down beside the dead man and tried to think.

CHAPTER VI.



Mrs. Hart's tears fell fast from very pity.

But thought in his then physical condition was an impossibility. The more he endeavored to muster ideas into line, to pursue suggestions and to reach definite conclusions, the more elusive did each and all become. The affair was at a deadlock which his wearied brain refused even to strive to break, busying itself perversely instead with the requirements of his wearied body. Nature had been pushed to the point of resistance and doggedly demanded her rights.

Had the case been that of another man Royal would have recognized the futility of his effort at once, but for himself he persisted fully half an hour in the totally useless experiment of trying to force nerve and brain tissue to work of which for the time they were incapable, thereby proving that knowledge and experience admit of more ready application to general than to particular cases, and also the truth of the proposition that a man has usually one rule for his neighbor and another for himself. However, he gave it up at last, forced, like his betters, to admit that so long as spirit shall be incorporate in matter it must submit to the limitations of matter. He made such temporary explanations to the ladies under his charge and such arrangements for their comfort as would relieve him of anxiety on their account for the hours necessary to secure needed rest for himself.

When he awoke the light was struggling through the shutters with the gray pallor peculiar to winter dawn. The great hotel and the streets around it were as still as the heart of a desert. Royal dressed himself and went to the window. All along the street, in places, shadows lay, as sharply defined as silhouettes by the electric glare, which deals little in the soft shading and witchery of the moonlight which it simulates. It was too early even for the rattling of milk carts or the matutinal billingsgate of sparrows; but away in the distance, beyond the voiceless thoroughfares and expressionless houses, the sky was faintly coloring for joy in a coming good.

Royal drew a chair to the window, and grappled anew with the situation, taking it externally, and as apart from himself, after the manner of a man of action whose intuitive position relative to circumstances is that of an extraneous, coercive force, rather than one which is inherent and, insensibly, regulative.

It did not take him many moments to decide that a disclosure of the true state of the case was inevitable, and must be made as speedily as possible. In spite of the intimate connection with the affairs of the dead man which had been thrust upon him, he knew next to nothing of his family relations or circumstances. He might have brothers and sisters, even parents, living with whom it would be necessary to communicate at once by letter or telegram. There would be funeral arrangements to make, and explanations of some sort to give to the curious. A man dying amid a hotel full of people cannot be carried to a cemetery, and incontinently buried without further cognizance being taken of the mattter than such as would be involved in the settlement of hotel and undertaker's charges. None knew better than Royal the impossibility of avoidance or escape from the omnipresence of human curiosity.

The question in point was, to whom should the story first be told? Under ordinary circumstances it would have seemed to him most fitting that the person most nearly concerned in an affair should be the one earliest made intimate with its ramifications; but the present circumstances were anything but ordinary, and the communication he was called upon to make might easily be reckoned unprecedented. Royal's instincts revolted from the straightforward method; it seemed to him rough and brutal. He still hoped, in some as yet misty and mysterious manner, to be able to spare Phyllis a little, or at least to soften things for her. Knowledge of her affliction had aroused his interest in a way totally apart from, and yet strangely commingled with, the interest awakened by the peculiarity of his own position toward her.

To this last, indeed, he gave little thought, for in his mind she was still too closely associated with John Royal to admit of identification in any way with himself. He was simply conscious as a man of an infinite pity for her and as a physician of the fact that here was a case which would require delicate handling.

His thought hovered around Mrs. Hart with an ever increasing sense of relief and satisfaction. Here was a beacon amid the rough waters for them. He had been brought too frequently into juxtaposition with the creature feminine under various and trying circumstances not to recognize a sensible and helpful woman whenever he beheld one. If there should be worse breakers ahead she would indicate their presence and also show him how to shape his course so as to avoid more damage than would be imperative. Of his own unaided efforts in this matter he had come to feel profound distrust.

The event proved that he had not reckoned without his host, for when the natural consternation and bewilderment incident to an upheaval of accepted conditions had passed away Mrs. Hart rallied to his assistance with all the gallantry of a large natured woman. Her acquaintance with John Royal had been so slight that her regret for his death was without the poignancy of personal bereavement, while her admiration, sym-

IF I HAD KNOWN.

If I had known in the morning
How wearily all the day
The words unkind
Would trouble my mind
I said when you went away,
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain,
But we vex "our own"
With look and tone
We might never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace,
Yet it might be
That never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth in the morning
That never come home at night;
And hearts have broken
And harsh words spoken
That sorrow can n'er set right.

We have careful thoughts for the stranger,
And smiles for the coming guest;
But oft for our own
The bitter tone,
Though we love "our own" the best!
Ah! lips with the curve impatient,
Ah! brow with that look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night to late to undue the work of the morn.

HIS WIFE'S SECRET.

When that particularly shrewd and business-like young man, Mr. Thomas Partington, joined himself to Ada relict of Isaac Jones, his friends evinced considerable surprise at the step. The widow was, indeed, as they confessed, young and fascinating, and had, moreover, inherited a very substantial fortune from her previous husband.

But then she was dreadfully extravagant in her habits, and had lately developed a perfect mania for gambling. In fact, her losses on the turf and at the card table were becoming quite the talk of society, and it is certain that, even during the short period which elapsed between her first husband's death and the date of her second marriage, her fortune must have materially diminished by the drains she made upon it.

In another year or two, at her present rate, she would—so Tom's friends said—run through it altogether. And then he would find himself in the unenviable position of having to support a recklessly spendthrift wife entirely out of his own pocket. A few of his greatest intimates impressed this upon him before he took the final plunge and urged him to back out of his engagement ere it was yet too late. But Tom turned a deaf ear to their advice. He was very much in love with the charming widow. And besides, he entertained a strong hope that after their union he should be able to reform, or at least control, his wife's extravagance.

Instead, therefore, of trying to cry off the match, he hurried it forward to the best of his ability, in order that she might have as short an interval as possible in which to enjoy the unchecked expenditure of her money.

But when he was married to the lady he found that his hope of being able to reform her had been decidedly chimerical. Selfwilled and headstrong, she would scarcely endure advice, much less any semblance of restraint. So after a few months of useless remonstrance, he gave up all attempt to genuine reformation as a bad job, and had to content himself with showing silent disapproval of her extravagance, or with throwing in their way such feeble obstacles as he could.

And as time went on people noticed that Mrs. Partington's gambling transactions were on a much smaller scale. And each day the once light-hearted and reckless woman grew more moody and depressed.

Tom appeared to notice this change in his wife. His manner towards her, always kind and attentive, became actually tender in its consideration, and he tried his hardest to soothe away her gathering depression of spirits.

His wife seemed to feel his considerate tenderness very deeply, for several times as he sat beside her of an evening, with his arm thrown caressingly around her, she suddenly buried her face on his shoulder and burst into tears—like one whose remorse is awakened by unmerited and unlooked-for kindness.

On each of these occasions Tom felt by a certain subtle and impalpable instinct that his wife was on the very verge of making some confession—perhaps of sorrow and regret for her defiant attitude towards him in the past. But although by his comforting words and his soothing caresses he did his best to invite her confidence the confession which he felt to be hanging on her lips never issued from them.

Meantime, what was so clear to her husband did not escape the notice of Mrs. Partington's female friends. Of these she had many, but by far the most favored and confidential of them was Mrs. Brandon, an old school-fellow with whom she had kept up a lifelong intimacy. Mrs. Brandon, who was at once a very lively and a highly sensible lady, had at an early period detected the unusual gloom which had come over her friend's manner, and rallied her upon taking her new position so serously.

"My dear Ada," she said at last, in the course of an afternoon call, during which Mrs. Partington had been more dull than ever. "I should never have encouraged you to accept Tom if I had foreseen what a deplorable effect your second dose of matrimony would have upon you. Do you know that in the twenty minutes I have been here the only original observation you have made was to ask me whether I had enough sugar? What is the matter with you to-day?"

Mrs. Partington muttered something about a "bad headache."

"But have you always a bad headache nowadays?" continued Mrs. Brandon, more seriously. "I should not have alluded to the subject if this were the first time that I have seen you thus. But for weeks I have observed you growing more and more gloomy and depressed. You are getting quite unlike your old self, and I cannot help feeling seriously uneasy about you. What does it mean?"

To Mrs. Brandon's surprise her friend, instead of answering, only burst into tears and buried her face in her handkerchief. Evidently, thought Mrs. Brandon, the once gay and sprightly Ada was very changed indeed.

"Come, Ada," she said, drawing her chair closer and taking one of her friend's hands, "you have something on your mind. I thought so before; now I am sure of it. Tell me all about it. It will do you good to confide to some one, and you and I have never had a secret from one another during the last twenty years. Is it anything to do with Tom?"

"No; no—indeed it isn't! Pray don't think that!" sobbed Mrs. Partington.

"Well, that's a mercy!" observed Mrs. Brandon. "Then it must be something to do with yourself. What is it?"

There was a short pause, during which Mrs. Partington's sobs slightly subsided.

"Nell," she said presently, "It's all your fault."

"My fault, dear!" exclaimed Mrs: Brandon.

"Your fault," repeated Mrs. Partington. "It has all come of your introducing me to that hateful Pompadour Club. Oh, how I wish I had never entered the place!"

"You don't mean to say—" Mrs. Brandon paused and looked at her friend.

"I mean to say that, unknown to Tom, I have been playing there every afternoon, and losing constantly, until—oh, Nell, promise swear that you will not tell Tom this!"

"Of course not. Have we ever betrayed one another's confidence, dear? But you must promise me something, too. Promise that you will tell Tom."

"I? Oh, Nell, you don't know what you are asking. You have not heard all yet. I would not have Tom know it for all the world! Rather than that I would—"

Mrs. Partington's sobs had burst forth again with renewed force. Suddenly she sank back on the sofa with a cry of pain which alarmed her friend. Perceiving that she was really ill, Mrs. Brandon summoned assistance. Many minutes did not elapse before one of the servants was hurrying off for a doctor.

Very shortly after the arrival of that functionary Mrs. Brandon herself left. She drove directly to the club where Tom Partington occasionally called for an afternoon on his way home from the city. By good luck he was there now, and the message which Mrs. Brandon sent in quickly brought him to her carriage door. A very few words passed between them, but enough to make Tom's face grow to twice its normal length.

"I will be off at once," he said.

"Do," responded Mrs. Brandon, "but mind, not a word yet! Not until she is quite well again."

"Trust me!" cried Tom. He was already hailing a passing hansom, and with a hurried bow to Mrs. Brandon he jumped into it.

When he reached home he sprang up the steps and rang the door-bell sharply. It was opened in about half a second by the cook, who, with a look of deep importance on her face, gasped out: "Please, sir, will you be as quiet as possible. And—and—it's a boy!"

Before her bewildered master had time to make any inquiries relative to this information, the doctor, who had been descending the stairs when he entered, came up to him and took him by the hand.

"I must congratulate you, my dear sir," he said, "on the birth of a remarkably fine son. I am glad to tell you, too, that Mrs. Partington is going on as well as can be expected. But she is naturally very weak. So, if you go in to see her, do not stop more than a minute or allow her to talk. Anything calculated to excite her must be most carefully avoided. I will call in again later and see how she is progressing."

At the end of a week it was evident that Mrs. Partington was only mending very slowly, and the doctor expressed his conviction to the husband that something was weighing on the patient's mind, the removal of which was essential to her complete recovery.

On the same afternoon, as he sat by his wife's bedside, with one of her hands in his, he said kindly, "Ada, my dear you have something on your mind."

A quick flush overspread her pale face and she averted his gaze, murmuring in a confused tone, "What makes you fancy that, Tom?"

"The eyes of love are quick to see such things," replied her husband, tenderly, as he stroked her hair with his disengaged hand. "Do you think I failed to remark it just now when, as your glance fell on the little one there, a groan escaped your lips? And you have shown by many other signs that something is troubling you."

"Oh, Tom," she cried suddenly, leaning forward and hiding her face on his shoulder, "you will not speak so kindly when you know the truth. Yet I must tell you, my—my husband. You have been so kind and gentle that I cannot deceive you any longer. But try, Tom (pleadingly), not to be angry with me."

"There is no fear of that," said Tom, encouragingly,. "Come, little woman, let us have the murder out."

"Ah, you do not know what it is," she went on in remorseful tones, "else you would not treat it so lightly. Oh, Tom, Tom, I—I—have lost all my fortune."

"How did you manage that?" he asked quietly.

"You may well put such a question," she continued, in a voice broken by frequent sobs. "You may well fail to understand my folly and madness. Oh, Tom! Tom! though I used to set you at defiance in the matter of gambling, yet your open remonstrance and silent disapproval in time began to vex my heart. And when I discovered a secret gambling club, where I could indulge my insatiable passion without your knowledge, I at once began to frequent it.

The game was roulette, the one of all others in which I had always longed to join. I gave myself up to its fascinations, and staking wildly incurred heavy losses day after day.

"I vowed that I would win back all that I had lost, and with that intention, for my strange gambler's craving was somehow dying away, staked heavily at the tables. But my endeavor was nothing else than throwing good money after bad. I lost, lost, lost, until my whole fortune was gone. Do not," very piteously, "do not reproach me, Tom. My own heart is reproaching me already almost more than I can bear."

"My darling," he replied, "I have no thought of reproaching you. If I had meant to do that, I should have done it before this, for I have known all about it a long while."

"You have known all about it a long while?" she cried, raising her tearful eyes wonderingly to his. "O Tom, how did you find out?"

"Very easily, my pet," he answered, kissing her forehead, "seeing that the founder and proprietor of the gambling club where you lost your money is no other than —myself."

She regarded him in speechless amazement. He went on to explain himself further.

"Yes, it is quite true. When I found that advice and remonstrance were lost on you, my dear, I had to look about for another method of saving you from the effects of your folly. And the starting of that private gambling club was the method which occurred to me. It took some working out of details and the employment of a good bit of capital to get the thing properly about. But I enlisted the services of a competent agent, whom I paid well and undertook to indemnify in case the club were found out by the police. It has not been discovered nor never will be; for its object having been gained, the establishment is finally closed. There, Ada, that is enough to enable you to grasp the truth. But, tell me, are you sorry to learn that all the money which you lost has passed back into my hands?"

"Sorry," she ejaculated, raising herself in bed and wreathing her arms around his neck in a joyful, fond embrace. "Oh, Tom, how kind and good and clever you are. I can never love or thank you enough."

Tom Parington gave the most convincing truth that he well could have given of his belief in the sincerity of his wife's repentance. He handed back to her the whole of her money without condition or reservation, and he has never had cause to regret it.—New York Evening World.

CAT AND RAT.

A Charitable Feline Adopts and Cares For a Homeless Rodent.

A laborer employed in one of the mills at Sutter Creek has in his home one of the strangest families in existence. The head of the family is an old cat, which is the mother of a thrifty family of five kittens; but in spite of the cares of motherhood, she has taken it upon herself to provide for a rat that she has taken under her protection.

During a storm about two months ago a half-grown rat, lame and nearly drowned, crawled into the house, evidently in search of food and shelter, and by some chance made its way to the place where the old cat lay snugly on the heap of sacks with her family.

Strangely the mother seemed touched with pity over the condition of the wanderer, and instead of attacking him, she cooly made room for him and did everything to relieve his sufferings. The rat displayed every sign of gratitude, and the miner's family when they discovered the intruder, were so struck with surprise that they forbade anyone to disturb them.

The result was that the rat chose to remain with his new-found friends, and has now become as docile as his foster mother, A warm attachment seems to have sprung up between the two, and the rat has grown fat and lazy, wandering about as it suits his fancy, and evidently pleased with its new surroundings—From the San Franciscio Call.

FREAKS OF MEMORY.

The Case of a Young Woman Who Led Two Separate Lives.

Three extraordinary instances of what doctors call "periodic amnesia" were related one night by a prominent physician attached to a New York Hospital. The first was that of a young American woman who on awakening from a protracted sleep lost memory of all she had before learned. Her memory had been capacious and well stored with a copious stock of ideas. Unexpectedly she fell into a profound sleep, which continued several hours beyond the ordinary term. On waking she was discovered to have lost every trace of acquired knowledge. All vestiges, both of words and things, were obliterated. By new efforts she again acquired the art of spelling, reading, writing and calculating, and gradually became acquainted with persons and objects like a being for the first time brought into the world. In these exercises she made considerable proficiency. After a few months another fit of somnolency possessed her. On rousing from it she found herself restored to the state she was in before the first paroxysm, but was wholly ignorant of every event that had befallen her afterward. The former condition of her existence she used to call the old state, and the latter the new state. In the old state she possessed fine powers of penmanship. In the new she wrote a poor, awkward hand having had neither the time nor the means to become an expert.—N. Y. Telegram.

ABOUT THE WOMEN FOLKS.

INTERESTING GOSSIP FOR THE WOMEN FOLKS.

What to Wear--A Plucky Woman--Coming of Crinoline--Matrons as Heroines in Fiction--The Girl on a Wheel.

What to Wear.

The chic of new gowns lies in the bodice, as skirts are uniformly plain. The fancy of the moment is for bodices with jacket fronts, short and jaunty Zouaves, or Figaros cut in new and varied ways. The top of the jacket is sometimes shaped in two square corners above the armholes, with lapping stitched edges falling on a full vest—a pretty fashion for snow-flake wools or fine mohairs. Other jacket fronts are formed entirely of wide moire sash ribbon over a crepon bodice; lace Zouaves are on crepe de Chine gowns; very square revers or gathered jabot revers edge other Souaves; and an entire jacket of crepon (sleeveless. of course) is worn over a bodice of India silk.

Another fancy considered extremely stylish is that of putting a vest of black mousseline do soie in wool gowns of very light colors. Thus a Newport dress of pinkish-mauve veiling has a round bodice, with short Figaro front turned back in little revers from a full gathered vest of black silk muslin, this vest is set under a short square yoke and collar of white Irish lace of very open pattern, and is gathered in at the waist line under a girdle of the lace, which is quite narrow there, but widens gradually on the sides to form a broad corselet in the back; a little coat frill of the lace is set on just in the middle of the back. The high collar is a straight puff of the black mousseline, with a bit of the white lace above it, fastened in the back upper a small bow of mousseline. The skirt, with bias seam down the back, is cut slightly longer. A lovely house gown of yellow crepon—the design woven in boyadere stripes—has a similar vest of black chiffon, with yoke, corselet, and collar of white guipure lace studded with jet cabochons.

White dotted lawns have designs of fruits and leaves, one especially gay having clusters of red cherries with their dark green leaves. Other lawns, with China blue inch stripes alternating with pink stripes, are trimmed with white point d'esprit lace used as bretelles on the bodice and as insertions in ruffles that form a coat frill and flounces on the skirt.

Watteau designs of baskets of flowers rival the familiar bow-knot patterns on new India silks, gauzes, and nets—piece nets and laces for flounces as well. Baskets of roses and forget-me-nots are overturned on cream white silks, the flowers strewing the light ground; violets and carnations are heaped in yellowish baskets on black India silks. Jetted baskets embroidered in fine-cut beads are on thin-meshed black nets, while heavier nets have the basket design woven in them.

The Girl On a Wheel.

Two conditions are needed for a girl's perfect bicycle costume, says The Ladies Home Journal; looseness, to permit free actions to the muscles, and a dark color. A plain skirt is a matter of course—no reeds or tournure being used. The under or foundation skirt should never be less than two and a half yards wide. An excellent plan is to face this skirt with velveteen. Also to cut from four to six slits, an eighth of a yard up, making what dressmakers term a "give," these preventing the dress from drawing around the feet. The front of the drop-skirt may be plaited but do not use accordeon plaits. The back should be shirred across the top very full. A blouse-waist is not absolutely necessary; unless it is especially becoming it looks mannish, or else slovenly on a rider when at full speed, Of course you ride in very loose corsets or a corset-waist, which is better. Then make the body of your bicycle suit to conform to your figure but just as easy fitting as you can have it yet fit well. Have very, very loose sleeves, Buy enough material for a second pair for they will go soon enough. A high collar is an abomination. So are linen cuffs. Have a rolling collar, use a natty silk tie under it, fasten the ends securely with a "stick pin," and leave all other jewelry at home. Saxe Biarrits gloves are best, and russet shoes are in place on a bicycle. The ventilated shoe with rubber soles in use in the ladies' gymnasiums has everything to recommend it to a girl rider. Many riders like, as an undergarment, the divided skirt. Still others veto it. It is a matter of perssnal comfort or discomfort. Dress warmly and yet beware of getting overheated.

Athletic Gowns.

In these days when lawn tennis has become a national pastime, habimakers give special attention to devising pretty, suitable costumes for players.

This tennis dress, from Redfern, is of thin tennis serge, in a delicate shade of shrimp pink. The skirt is plain, but the loose bodice is made of a goods striped with twin hair lines seperated by spaces of about two inches. Plain material is introduced in front, and the cuffs and collar, which are ornamented with embroidery, complete the bodice.

The great value of gymnastic exercises is beginning to be fully appreciated by our schools for girls. The girls in classes of this kind undergo a thorough training. In English schools, a medical examination of the lungs, heart and spine, to ascertain what exercises will be most beneficial to the scholar, is a part of the training, and is an excellent precaution against over or injudicious training. As a rule, gymnastic dresses are exceedingly ugly, and the majority of those students who take the training content themselves with a dress of navy blue flannel, simply brightening it with a little white braid. Such a gown is not conspicuous for its pronounced ugliness, because it can never be very conspicuous.

This dress is an attractive one, because it is a departure from conventional gymnastic suits. It is of soft cream-white flannel, trimmed with rows of broad vieux-rose braid, with a row of narrower braid put on in a curled pattern over it. A soft russet shoe with a perfectly flexible sole is generally preferred for use in the gymnasium.—Good Housekeeping.

A Plucky Woman.

Poor Philip Welch, the humorist, who died literally with a jest upon his lips, toiling manfully at writing funny items to make what provision he could for his family even while the shadow of an awful death by cancer was upon him, has left a widow as plucky as himself. Mrs. Welch was left with four small children, the youngest only about a year old. She kept her home and family together, and is maintaning them by journalistic work, to which she was almost unaccustomed when she was forced to take it up, but for which she shows a decided gift. She conducts a department upon a Brooklyn paper, and the Sunday column and half in the Times of New York entitled "Her Point of View," which is from her pen, and is one of the best journalistic specialties ever developed in New York.

Mrs. Welch tried joke-writing herself at first, but found serious work more in her vein. Mr. Welch always attributed to her the chief credit of his deliciously funny series on the "Tailor-made Girl."

Coming of Crinoline.

There are again awful and still louder rumors that crinoline if not the hideous hoop-skirt proper, is looming up on fashion's horizon. It is certain that skirts are being made by leading, ruling ateliers with accentuated fullness at the foot, produced by means of V gores in the fountain skirt, and also by full rose ruchings. or fan-insertions of silk or lace let in at the lower edge of gowns, while others are festooned with flounces at the hem, or "battlemented" or vandyked at the bottom with a silk pleating beneath. Skirts so distended have in times past led by degrees to further increase in volume until there was a culmination in the ugly, grotesque wire cage, devoid of either grace or utility.—New York Evening Post:

Matrons As Heroines in Fiction.

If the married woman is to be the heroine of the coming novel it must turn on something besides love-making. It must be the story of her career; of her profession or political success; of her painful accession through toilsome decades to the front rank of the doctors; of the money she made and what she did with it. American women are very much alive in these days. There is no special difficulty about writing interesting books about them without using men at all except as puppets or lay figures —Scribner.

Tips For the Table.

PICKLED OYSTERS.—Bring a quart oysters to a boil in their own liquor. Scald a pint of vinegar and sprinkle salt and pepper over the oysters when taken from the stove, then pour the vinegar over them and serve.

CORN PIE.—With a sharp knife slice the grains from five ears of corn. Beat this in with three eggs, a pint of milk, tablespoonful of butter, and salt and pepper to taste. Pour into a pudding dish, and bake twenty-five minutes.

APPLE GRIDDLE CAKES.—Make a batter of flour and milk and eggs; stir into it enough chopped apple to have the fruit well represented in each cake; fry on a griddle and eat with maple syrup.

A good tea cake that a dyspeptic can eat without injury if cold. One cup of sugar, one egg, a half cupful of sour cream, the same of sweet milk, a small teaspoonful of soda, a little salt and nutmeg; bake an hour before tea time, so that the cake may have time to cool.

COOKING UTENSILS.—They ought to be put where they will be at once convenient and open to the air and light. The whole kitchen and all its accessory apartments, pantries, closets, etc., should be flooded with light, and so arranged that they can be thoroughly ventilated.

BOILED DRIED BEEF.—For a piece of dried beef weighing two pounds, allow two hours' steady boiling. Remove from the fire and allow the beef to stand in the water until cold. This beef, cut in thin slices, will be found very nice for luncheon or light suppers.

BAKED SHRIMPS.—Boil, for twenty minutes, in well salted water, one plate of shrimps. Drain, peel, and chop very fine. Add three eggs, tablespoonful of butter, saltspoonful each of black pepper and ground celery; stir together and pour in to a greased pan. Cover with bread crumbs, and bake fifteen minutes. This is delicious.

MOLASSES CAKE—Three cups of flour, one cupful of brown sugar, one-third of a cupful of butter; cut the butter up into flour, then add the sugar and mix well with the hands; then add one cupful of New Orleans molasses, one cupful of boiling water, and a teasponful of soda dissolved in a little vinegar. Stir until perfectly smooth, and then bake in a square, shallow pan for three-quarters of an hour, in a moderate oven.

An Injustice Corrected.

In a late issue of a number of Northwestern newspapers there appeared a paragraph headed "Trips of Presidents," a portion of which read as follows: "One of the most bitter insults offered to president Cleveland was the newspaper slander uttered concerning his wife and himself by an irresponsible crank named Alden J. Blethen, while he was in Minneapolis." As will be remembered by many of our readers, this refers to an outrageous attack upon the then President and his wife which appeared in the Tribune of Minneapolis, while they were the guests of that city. At the time the paper was controlled by Mr. Blethen and W. E. Haskell and the authorship of the attack referred to, was for several days popularly accredited to the former. Life was made such a burden to Mr. Blethen that Mr. Haskell in justice to his partner made a personal statement through the editorial columns of the Tribune, completely exonerating Mr. Blethen from any part in or even knowledge of the publication until after its appearance in print and himself assuming the entire responsibility of the affair. From this statement of facts it will be seen that the paragraph above referred does a grave injustice to Mr. Blethen which we have done our best to correct and overcome.

The Precocious Little King of Spain.

Apropos of the sixth birthday of the little king of Spain, the following "instantaneous photograph" has been published: "He is small, very small. He is just 5 years old. Lively, restless, a tease, tres diable, and extremely precocious. He dreams of uniforms, regiments, flags and bugles. He no longer wants toy-horses, but has been asking his royal mother for the last two years to give him a horse with flesh and bones. He says 'thou' to all the world, and calls old generals by the diminutive of their names. Thus, the chief of the military department is 'Juanito,' and Marshal Martinez becomes 'Campitos.' His grey-haired governess is his 'Paca.'"

Willie, said the visitor, what is your ambition?

I'd like, said the boy, putting down his yellow covered story of the plains, to have people tremble like leaves at the mere mention of my name.—Harper's Young People.

SUNSHINE AFTER TEMPEST.

"AND this is the end!"

The speaker's voice trembled and his face grew white.

"It is all your own fault."

The second voice sounded full of tears, but a bright danger signal flamed on either cheek.

"Oh, Grace, how can you say so? You know I am only true to my convictions and my country."

"Well, dear me! I wish we had never come South at all, and I wish that I had never seen you, Rollin Richie!"

"There, Grace, don't cry! It can do no good, now. You are determined to annul our engagement because I am a rebel, as your father terms me. I may be a rebel in his eyes, but not in my own. He and your brother are hurrying north to array themselves against a section whose hospitality they have long enjoyed. I am staying here to defend my home, my mother, my property, and my country. If you could only love me a little, Grace, in spite of this unhappy difference in convictions, I could endure everything else and wait patiently until the strugle is ended and we are once again united."

Looking up through her tears into his face, Grace Grantly forgot all but that she did love him better than all else in life.

"I will be faithful, Rollin," she said, all sign of her former passion subsiding.

Thus Rollin Richie and Grace Grantly renewed their broken troth, and spent the few remaining days of their stay together in hopeful anticipation of their future.

"I do not really think this unpleasantness will amount to anything serious," Rollin said, and Grace believed it. She was the daughter of a northern clergyman, and together they had been boarding in the South for a year past on account of the latter's failing health. Here, in this lovely country, she met and had learned to love Rollin Richie, a wealthy young planter. The young man, with his mother, was strongly in sympathy with the South, while the Grantlys naturally made preparations at once to return to more politically-congenial surroundings.

In her first surprise and indignation at her lover's avowed intention to fight against the old flag, Grace had annulled their engagement; but Rolin had been very gentle with her, and now at the last she found her affection for him rising superior to all other emotions. The final parting was very bitter; bitter for her because, in all the eighteen years of her life, she had never known a wish ungratified; bitter for him because dimly he foresaw that turbulent times would yet be known before peace was restored; bitter for both, because the chances of their ever meeting again were few.

Their last drive was over the vast plantation that had been in the Richie family for generations. There were marks of thrift and improvement everywhere, not common in the South at this time: even the negro quarters were in good condition and the slaves seemed contented and happy.

"When next you see this place, Grace, it may be laid waste, and the dear old home there, where I have dreamed of seeing you mistress, burned to ashes," he sadly commented; and then she had gone into the house to bid his mother and cousin farewell.

They were very gracious to her and she could scarcely realize that soon her brother and lover would face each other in deadly combat.

Nona Gleason, the cousin, watched the young couple out of sight, then remarked that Grace was a nice little thing, but not a fit choice for Rollin.

"If she pleases my boy, she pleases me," responded the fond mother. Nona gave a suggestive shrug, and changed the subject. She was wholly dissimilar to Grace. The latter was petite, blonde, with pretty, childlike ways; Nona was tall and dark, with a woman's carriage and repose, and the ambition of her life had been to win Rollin Richie, but a mere child had carried off the prize.

"How changed from K—!" Grace said wearily, to her father on the first evening of their return home, after listening to the excited talk of their friends. "I guess I have grown a bit of a rebel," she added, laughing a little.

"You broke your engagement with Richie?" Mr. Grantly asked suddenly.

"I—yes—that is, I broke it, then—then renewed it again. Oh, papa—!" and she flung herself in his arms to sob out her grief as she always had. She had never known a mother's sympathy.

Of course he tried to comfort her and did not scold a bit. How could he? Nor could he blame Richie. Indeed, he felt that if he had to decide between Grace and his country, he would take the former.

When Fred Grantly marched away, his sister's parting injunction rang in his ear: "If ever you meet Rollin Richie, spare him for my sake."

"Confound it! it isn't pleasant to be obliged to turn every reb around and study his phiz before you shoot or bayonet him, to see if he looks like your sister's lover; but I'd hate to hurt Gracie."

Fred had met Richie once and remembered his face well. A year passed, a dreadful year to Gracie Grantly, for while others were spending their sympathies on the Union cause, her feelings were divided and she could not help it; her sympathy might be with the Union cause but her heart was with her lover. Once in a while she received a letter, but at the end of the year even these ceased and in their stead there now came one from Nona Gleason. It was brief, too, just said that Rollin was dead and the old home burned.

She had never permitted herself to even think that anything worse than wounds or imprisonment could befall him—and now this! She reeled as from a blow; the letter fell from her hand and merciful unconsciousness followed. She recovered, but the look in her face frightened her friends, and she was so silent, so mute! Vainly her father wooed her to her old resting-place in his arms.

"Presently, papa," she would answer in an absent-minded way and then seek solitude. She wrote to Nona but received no reply. How far she might have indulged her grief is a mere matter of speculation, but grave fears were entertained concerning her. When Fred was dangerously wounded Mr. Grantly went to him and Grace had all she could do to comfort his wife, who was in very poor health; then there were the two little ones to care for.

Mrs. Fred was one who indulged in hysteria and kept half a dozen persons running with bottles of hot water and cold cloths. Grace was very patient with her until baby Lute came down with measles; then she turned her attention chiefly to him. In due time Mr. Grantly brought Fred home a mere wreck of his former robust self. There was plenty to occupy Grace now, she never faltered though, the color fled from her face and her step lost its elasticity.

Before the war was formally ended, poor Mrs. Fred and her two little ones were sleeping under the green grass, and Grace found herself the sole comfort of father and brother. Bravely she put her own grief aside, smiling oft times when the heart was sore and heavy.

Nine years pass, and Grace Grantly is Grace Grantly still, a little graver, a little more stately than when first we knew her, but that is all. Vainly have suitors in all conditions of life sued for favor; she cares for none. Now, too, her father has joined those on the other side, and Fred being remarried, she is quite alone. A restless longing possesses her to visit K— and to look once more on ground hallowed by past associations. She wants to visit Rollin's grave, if so be they have brought him home. "I will arrange to be there on Memorial Day," she told herself.

Arriving at K. late in the evening of May 29, she repaired at once to a hotel. The one where they had boarded years before, had fallen a victim to the ravages of war and was no more. In the morning she wandered alone toward the Richie plantation. The shaded roadway, at least, seemed familiar and she loitered on, dreading to come in sight of the ruined home where Rollin had hoped to see her mistress.

Rounding a curve in the road, she stopped with a cry of surprise and delight: the old mansion loomed up as majestic as ever. What could it mean? But after the first gush of surprise she considered that it might have been but partially destroyed and had been rebuilt. Slowly she wended her way up the serpentine drive, longing yet dreading to reach the house. A moment she paused with her foot on the lowest step of the vine-wreathed porch, to break off a climbing rosebud—she had often worn them from this very vine—when a startling exclamation above caused her to turn her face in its direction.

"Rollin!"

"Grace!"

A face, almost fiendish in its baffled despair and terror, watched the meeting of the long-estranged lovers, then before their explanations were half made, Nona Gleason had quitted, by a side entrance, the Ritchie mansion forever.

She it was who had forged a letter, purporting to be from Grace, telling of her marriage with a Union officer, and forwarded it to Rollin at the same time that she had written to Grace. Hers had been a desperate game and almost a successful one, for Rollin had about decided to marry her for his mother's sake. The latter was a helpless invalid now and it had been part of Nona's plan to make herself necessary to her aunt. Of late, however, she had threatened leaving.

The happily reunited pair did not give her much thought; they were too thankful for the sunshine, after all the tempest, to court clouds on the horizon.

"Few spend such happy Memorial Days as this," Grace said, as they stood together on the vine-wreathed porch late that evening, watching the man of God, who had just united them, ride away.

"Our wedding day will ever be a sweet memorial," answered Rollin.—The Housekeeper.

Tricks of French Artists.

A French paper says that for two months of the year the chief business of the two thousand and odd exhibitors at the Salon is to attract the attention of visitors to their own pictures. Some of the "dodges" which have been found useful for the purpose, it seems, are highly ingenious. The plan found most effectual, and therefore most commonly employed, is the "Yankee Amateur Dodge." It consists of employing two or three agents, dressed in an eccentric fashion to walk backwards and forwards with a mysterious air. The public is greatly awed by their appearance and reports are soon circulated that the picture will be sold for its weight in gold.

Another highly-recommended plan is to hire the best-looking model introduced into the picture to walk backwards and forwards in front of the canvas. The identity is soon discovered, and great sensation is the consequence. A few years ago a painter found out a still more original plan. He placed some resinous substance, which would grow soft with warmth, in front of his own picture. The unfortunate person who happened to stop for a few minutes would find himself fixed to the spot for some time. Our authority thinks this last method the most business-like and effectual.

HOW TO RIDE A BICYCLE.

Advice About Training for Young Amateurs.

There was a time when bicycling was engaged in by only those who were supposed to have plenty of leisure time, but the great increase in the number of riders all over the world shows that many indulge in the past time who must consider that the indulgence is worth some inconvenience. The average amateur can afford neither the time nor the inconvenience to train the way a professional would. The ideal training is the kind that is taken with no special object in view, for there is no fear then of its being overdone.

If the novice works hard during the day at his business, and feels like keeping quiet when he arrives home, it would be a mistake to force upon himself a jaunt through the country, for his energy has been spent in other ways. If, however, he has simply a feeling of lassitude and not a genuine fatigue, a bicycle ride in fine weather cannot fail to act as a tonic to his muscular and nervous systems. To keep one's self in good condition a slight indisposition to exercise must not be taken for a true tired feeling. Beneficial training for bycycle riding is the same as preparing for any other athletic work. The nerves and the muscles must be built up. Every man starts with a certain quanity of each, and if he wishes to add to his supply he should not waste his capital by taking hard practice, but should only let out enough to attract more. Growing strong and active is merely cultivating the muscles so far as the nervous system will permit, or so that both that and the muscular system are equal to each other.

Bicycling is a very easy exercise in which to become expert. The advent of the safety machine has made road riding during the last several years more popular than ever. One can easily learn to ride a safety by having some friend hold the machine and give him a start, but a level place must be selected while learning to mount and ride.

It is generally acknowledged that bicycling is one of the most enjoyable of sports. A would-be sprinter or jumper must be born with a certain amount of snap and dash or he cannot succeed, but a bicyclist, even if he does not at first possess any great strength of leg, can persevere in his building-up process until his lower limbs of iron will push his wheel under the wire ahead of many a formidable antagonist.

Her Majesty's Annual Bath.

Her majesty, the Queen of Madagascar, has lately taken her yearly bath, and the act was surrounded with due pomp and ceremony. The official report states: "A solemn procession filed through, bearing the water for the bath, materials for the fire to heat it, made directly under the bathtub itself, the towels, soap, perfume and various toilet appurtenances. As soon as the water was sufficiently heated the fire was put out, prayers were said and a hymn sung, imploring that the queen suffer no harm from her daring act, and then as she disappeared behind the curtain a salvo of artillery was fired and the drums beat to announce to the excited multitudes outside that the important part of the ceremony was taking place. At the end of a brief fifteen minutes the queen reappeared, somewhat paler in hue, but gorgeously arrayed and wearing all the crown jewels. In her hand she carried an ox horn, tipped and bound with silver, full of water taken from the bath just previous to her entrance to it. Bearing this and accompanied by the prime minister, she marched to the palace portal, where she dipped a branch into the water and sprinkled the spectators as they passed along."

The Story of a Little Girl.

A while ago a little girl was lost in New York, and to the editors of a great paper came an appeal for help in finding her.

"We'll get up a picture to show everybody how she looks," said the editor, who has a soft spot in his heart for lost children. So a reporter was sent out, but presently returned to report that he could get no photograph of the girl, but that she was small of her age, always stood with her feet close together, had blue eyes, and wore a Nelly Bly peaked cap.

"Now get up a nice picture," said the editor, and the artist was puzzled, as well he might be, for the facts that the girl had blue eyes and was small of her age were of no use in a black and white drawing, and he had only the feet and the cap to work upon. However, he did the best he could and drew a picture of a real nice little girl.

The resemblance was remarkable. Everybody said so. The mother of the little girl came in to thank the artist and the editor, with tears in her eyes, after the girl had been found, and modern journalism entered another splendid triumph on its notched stick.

Bismarck and His Trees.

The Prince then proceeded to speak of his trees in the Sachsenwald. He described the spots where several of the finest stand, and some of them, he said, were fully 250 years old, or even more. He added—whether with an oblique reference or not to a certain living English statesman whose chief resemblance to himself is that he is not at present in office Herr Bewer does not inform us— "It always gives me a pain to have to fell a tree. I save and spare all I can."

He said that a Danish forester of his once said to him: "I must make a confession. I have embezzled a tree. It was marked for felling, but it was too beautiful and I have left it stand." "Well," I replied, if it is so beautiful, certainly let it stand."—London Standard.

"Beauty without grace is a hook without a bait." That's what the French think. Whether it be true or not, there are many American women who do not even possess the hook—beauty and attractiveness are denied them. Why? Because they're languid, cross and irritable. They know not what it is to be without pain or discomfort half the time.

That's it; suffer in silence—misunderstood—when there's a remedy—Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription—at hand that isn't an experiment, but which is sold, by druggists, under the guarantee that if you are disappointed in any way with it, you get your money back by applying to its makers.

A signal service to weak womenkind is the finding of lost health—the building up of a "run-down" system. Nothing does it so surely as the "Favorite Prescription." None like it!

For overworked, debilitated women, teachers, milliners, seamstresses, "shop-girls," nursing mothers—one and all are cured by it.

Important Trade Name Decision.

Judge Thayer of the United States Circuit Court at St. Louis, has recently handed down an opinion and granted a perpetual injunction against the defendants in the case of The Hostetter Co. against the Bruggeman Reinert Distilling Co., ALIAS "Gold Spring Distilling Co." prohibiting the advertising, manufacturing or selling of any article of stomach bitters either in bulk, by the gallon or otherwise, or in any way making use of the name "Hostetter" except in connection with the sale of the genuine bitters, which are always sold in bottles securely sealed, and also prohibiting the sale of any bitters in bulk, though the name "Hostetter" be not used, but the suggestion made to the purchaser that he can put them in the empty Hostetter bottles and purchasers would not discover the difference. His decision supports the Hostetter company in the extensive use of the name "Hostetter" in connection with either the manufacture or sale of stomach bitters in any manner or form whatsoever, and firmly establishes its ownership in the same as a "TRADE NAME."

A Man Who Handles Rattlesnakes.

The Valdosta, Ga., Times says there is a man in that city who can catch a snake in his hands and it will not bite him. He has repeatedly offered them an opportunity. You may chase a rattlesnake in a hollow log and this man can run his hand in and pull it out and the snake will not bite him. Dime museums all over the country are hungering and thirsting for just such a man. A fortune awaits him.

Curiously Addressed Letter.

A curiously addressed letter lately passed through the postoffice at Madrid, which was deciphered and correctly delivered, notwithstanding all difficulties. The address was a perfect rebus. At the left hand side was the figure of a lady; it was clear, therefore, to which sex the recipient should belong. Over the lady's head the sun was rising, hence her name was inferred to be Aurora. For her surname stood a hill with a castle at its foot which gives us "Montesty Castillo." Next comes the town, for which the plan of a city was drawn, on which the Alhambra was legible. This indicated Granada, but in order to leave no doubt possible, a pomegranate was drawn beside the plan. To complete the address a number was indicated in one of the streets of the city plan. The postal authorities took three days to study this curiosity and then triumphantly delivered the letter to "Senorita Aurora Montesty Castillo, Azacayas, No. 20, Granada," and so far from censuring the sender, they had the envelope photographed and a copy printed in the Madrid papers as a proof of the intelligence of the department.—Detroit Free Press.

Gold on a Mountain Peak.

A curious discovery has been made on Cedros Island, Mex., in the form of a bed of white sand, extending along the top of the mountain. It is believed to be the remains of an ancient quartz ledge, pulverized by intense heat, and is said to be as fine as though it had been run through a battery of stamps. It varies from three to eight feet in thickness, and is asserted to be rich in gold.

"The Quality of Mercy

Is not strained," neither is the relief afforded by that incomparable medicine, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Its prime attribute is thoroughness. Very conspicuous is this quality when it is used for malaria. The poison of that malady in the system it entirely expels. Equally effective is it in dyspepsia, constipation, bilious and kidney trouble and rheumatism.

They go the rounds of the press—cider apples.

The Long and the Short of It.

Out of the two million Union Soldiers in the last war three-fourths were American by birth. Of the remainder 175,000 were Germans 150,000 Irish 50,000 English, and 50,000 Canadians. The average height was 5 feet 8½ inches. Out of one million recorded heights, there were 4,000 men over six feet. The tallest man in the service was Capt. Van Buskirk of the 77th Indiana, who stood 6 feet 10½ inches in his stockings. The shortest soldier was a member of the 192d Ohio, whose statue was only 40 inches. In the matter of railroads "the long and the short of it, is that the LENGTH of the Burlington lines is over 7,000 miles, and it is the SHORTEST, quickest and best route for reaching all the larger places in ten states west of Chicago. THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

In state politics matters are cooling down. No one has been indicted through the efforts of the elevator investigating committee—Governor Merriam appears to have taken his grip from Senator Davis's seat. Donnelly and Eva have buried the hatchet and McHale clothes his nether limb in tights and descends into oblivion with the other apostles. There is always a calm before a storm.

How will the people's party decide upon the plank in their platform which covers the awful gulf of protection and free trade. In the fifth district of Minnesota we may expect a free trade platform—the laboring men who help to compose the people's party and whose daily bread depends upon factory work will no doubt declare as they have in the past, for protection. Thus will come a conflict that will smash into smithereens the otherwise strongest platform imaginable.

'Tis hardly necessary for us to add any condemnation to the utterly degraded royalty of England. While thousands of British subjects are, through the oppression of the British government, starving, the coming king is spending money taken from the people over the gambling table. Not only that, but he has shown himself to be a gambler of the lowest order. When the English people rise in their might and overthrow the dynasty—when they cease to fall on their knees and do homage to the governmental figurehead, Victoria, and her delapidated scoundrel of a son, they will command more respect from the world.

We predict a rip-roaring old time among the parties at the next election. Each will put forth every effort to capture the state—while the individuals seeking the United States senatorship will appeal from the throne of argument to that of mammon. The fifth district alliance men have fixed a slate that will carry the votes according to the dictates of the bosses. While the two old parties are each flaying snares to capture the leaders of the alliance, those leaders are making their positions as strong as possible, knowing their political talent and tactics will call out a larger sum. In the meantime the common voter watches his grain grow and is ignorant of the ignus fatuus which he thinks is leading him to the stream of political salvation but which in reality is directing his steps to the polluted stream of alliance bossism. The great question among the farmers is which faction will they follow. Many already see the fallacy of the alliance movement and will desert it in good time to go back to either of the old parties and the men who recently met to tell the fifth district farmers how to vote will have a party of their own consisting of political office seekers.

Queer Work.

The county commissioners have a novel way of doing business. They send a man around to repair bridges; he purchases supplies necessary, O. K.'s the bill with instructions to send it to the county auditor who will have warrant drawn and remit immediately. This is done on April 9th. The auditor allows the bill to remain in his office, (all the while knowing it should be verified) until the commissioners meet—he then gets the opinion of the allwise county attorney and on June the 15th the bill is returned to us for verefication. We expect to get our money sometime before Christmas. We don't know whether they serve anyone, other their political enemies in this manner but are willing to endure it until next election when we trust the bulls will be driven out of the people's china closet—the sanctuary rid of vandals.

Ed Hamry's ad should have appeared last week but he was too busy unpacking his new goods to call at our office—he gave us the "ad" but we forgot to insert it.

The Chas. Langevin block on Champagne av will be vacant after July 1st with the exception of the dwelling house which is occupied by H. A. McClatchie.

The Red Lake Indians have organized a baseball club and although none but the captain has ever seen a baseball game played they will challenge Crookston and are confident of victory. No doubt Crookston will accuse them of running in a twin city battery.

Murray Sanders is going to Texas shortly. He will no doubt be entertaining the cowboys in the Lone Star State telling about the deer he killed last fall. He won't say anything about the animal receiving a mortal wound from Fletcher's rifle a few minutes before and being ready to drop dead about the time Murray fired.

Our band has been engaged to furnish music for St. Jean at Maple Lake the 24th. The band boys are desirous of procuring a mess of fish and have succeeded in securing the service of Joe Bischoff to play the tuber, expecting that when Joe toots his horn it will have the same effect as discharging a dynamite cartridge. The fish will doubtless float.

Jas. C. O'Brien, the pioneer of Mud Creek, Battle River and Black Duck country departed last week for the pine country. Jim has a revolver something over twenty years old that has never been shot but once. That was about eight years ago. Jim was sauntering through the woods when the form of a moose appeared some forty rods distant. Jim immediately pulled his rusty pop, and the large moose dropped dead pierced through with a bullet. This is the first instance on record of a moose being killed at so long a range with a 32 calibre revolver. This revolver is now in our office and will be used upon the next man who says it's hot when the thermometer registers 104 in the shade.

Crookston has lost the Luthern College. It goes to Grand Forks. We had given Crookston citizens credit for better judgment, but they seemed to think they could cross swords with Grand Forks without a severe humiliation. Crookston is biting the dust hard.

It's just great, the number of people who get water out of Schreiter's well. W. A. keeps the well in good repair constantly, for the benefit of his friends. They come from all oyer Rail Road addition, Park addition and the original town site. The NEWS now honors the pump with patronage.

J. D. Marshall has gone down into his own pocket and is putting twenty five dollars' to improve the condition of the side hill leading to the North Side Roller Mill. The enterprise of this firm is indeed commendable and every citizen mus take a special pride in having such an institution in the city.

Last Saturday the firm of Redmund & Morin assigned what remained of their stock, to P. G. Falardeau, for the benefit of their creditors. This action of the firm was foreseen by every close observer and would no doubt have occurred sooner were it not for the fact that the firm had hopes of organizing the farmers' mercantile company and transferring their stock of hardware to the new concern. In fact the transfer had already been made and stock issued to Redmund & Morin. This stock was then mortgaged to Mercure to secure money. Redmund & Morin acted as agents for Mercure, guaranteeing him sixteen per cent. interest. The failure of this firm cannot but be regretted by the friends of both Messrs. Redmund and Morin. Both are men of energy and took an active part in village matters especially election. In politics both were alliance men and worked hard for the ticket last fall. The alliance loses two strong supporters, able, upright and honorable business men—should Messrs. Redmund and Morin not decide to remain with us.

The schoolboard have received the plans and specifications for the new school house and it is on exhibition at Schreiter's drug store. The building as shown has four rooms, and the whole is heated by furnaces. The structure will be square shaped, and the windows instead of being scattered over the whole outer surface, are in groups in the centre of each elevation. The whole structure presents a very artistic appearance and Red Lake Falls will be proud of its schoolhouse if ever it is built. President Schreiter informs us they intend to have it ready for the fall term. Bids will be advertised for and if a perfect title is not received when contract is let, other property secured. The board express the determination to have the building completed for the opening of school in september to have, at least two necessary rooms for the South Side teachers, which would be just as well. All progressive citizens are pleased to see the educational advantages of our thriving village thus put forward, and the chimes of another school bell will be heralded with joy.

The wind storm Saturday was disagreeable in the extreme. The NEWS had the pleasure of moving part of the outfit in the worst of the gale. The paper flying about frightened one of the dray horses, and when a sheet got twisted round his legs he thought it had gone far enough. Much of our type was on that load, and had the dray upset it would have been a horrible mix up—pie enough to celebrate a Fourth of July contest on. Everything came out serene, however.

Last Day of School.

Rev. Fr. Arpin, on his way home from Argyle learned that the report in the dailies of the natural gas at Warren is true. The artesian well yields both water and gas at the same time. It has been burning a week and creates considerable excitement.

Friday was a gala day for the school-children of Red Lake Falls. The kind-hearted teachers prepared for their pupils a day of unusual enjoyment, and thus sealed, on the last day, the bonds of friendship which are always sure to ripen between scholars and teachers. This year the festivities were not held in union. The principal's and North Side intermediate departments selected the famous Gervais grove as their picnic grounds; the South Side rooms had seyeral weeks previously decided to celebrate at the mouth of the river, while Mrs. Emard thought the school room was as fittting a place as any to bid her little charges gooc bye. We do not know what to say of the different festivities, other than that mirth and enjoyment held sway. Interested citizens in large numbers were present at each, many visiting the three places.

It was essentially a farewell party in the case of Mr. Hortvet and Miss Fairweather, both pf whom will look up other fields.

While Mrs. Emard remains with us, her labors in our school are over for some time, she having decided not to teach the coming session. This causes much regret among our citizens. She has taught the primary department successfully for a number of years, and has always been a favorite with the people.

Miss Dufly and Miss Boyle have already accepted their former positions for next session. These ladies have the indorsement of our citizens, having had the South Side schools under their charge for two term.

The board has not made any selection of teachers for the vacant positions, but will doubtless secure good teachers. They should be especially careful in the selection of a principal, as under this individual's supervision the schools are made to advance or recede, according to his ability.

Sir John A. Macdonald.

The issue of the Dominion Illustrated for the 20th inst. will be devoted almost exclusively to an account, with full illustrations, of the event which is in all men's minds, the funeral of the dead premier, Sir John A. Macdonald. No such out burst of popular sorrow over the death of any man has been evoked in Canada, as that which pays tribute to the greatness of the deceased statesman. The Dominion Illustrated sent its own photographer and artist to Ottowa and Kingston, and the number to be issued on the 20th inst, will be the memorial wor hy of the occasion, and one that througho Canada will be preserved as a sad souvenir of the man whose death left so great a void in the hearts of the people as well as in the public life of the country be has served so long and so devotedly.

"No cards," used in announcing a marriage in a newspaper means that the bride and bridegroom wish to maintain all their former visiting acquaintances. The custom of sending out cards enables them to drop such acquaintances as they may not wish to retain in the altered circumstances of their lives.

There are ten cables from North America to Europe. One cable reaches each important island of the Antilles and the Caribbean sea, and to the coast of Brazil. Another cable reaches other South American points, and the whole coast of South America is girdled by telegraphic lines reaching cable "ports."

The demand for Percheron horses for export is so great that the purity of the breed is seriously threatened, and a stud book has been started in France by which the pedigree may be preserved and the race kept up to the standard.

The Twentieth century begins on Jan. 1, 1901; the First century did not end with the year 99, but with the year 100; the Second century therefore began with the year 101, and the Twentieth century begins with the year 1901.

Sportsmen Never Get Ill.

As a rule a sportsman may take great liberties with himself without being much the worse. No man was ever harmed by wet feet on a moor, though if he comes home and contemplates them for an hour over a gunroom fire he may be reminded of the indiscretion. A deer stalker has to put up with great exposure and temporary discomfort, but he is rarely the worse for it. He may have to run at the top of his speed for two or three miles along a rough hillside to cut off a stag he has wounded or started, or in some way made a mistake with, and he arrives at his post as hot as a man can be.

The deer are not in sight, and have to be waited for in the best position for the shot, not for the comfort of the shooter. The place is high up—2,000 feet up, perhaps—among lichen and rocks and great patches of snow. It is October, and an east wind blows upon the little company of three which seems to cut into their very hearts. Finally a snow storm comes on, as it were a winding sheet. We have spent a couple of hours or more in such a position, teeth chattering, body shaking, fingers benumbed. If the stag judiciously waits for an hour he is probably missed. The above three phenomena do not promote good rifle shooting. Very likely the stag never comes at all. He was suspicious and uneasy and preferred to take an unusual pass, and so disappointment is added to the other discomforts. But such a wait has never made us ill, nor have we ever seen a stalker who was the worse for it.—Macmillan's Magazine.

One Way to Keep Streets Clean.

This good suggestion comes to the Listener:

I wish you would suggest as an aid to keeping litter from the streets that teachers in public schools, and especially in the vacation schools, should once or twice a week make the children see that throwing torn paper and other litter into the street is as much a breach of good manners as to throw such torn paper, etc., upon the floor of a lady's parlor. Such a comparison might have some effect. One thing I remember in my school days—my teacher's repeated enforcement of his rule that all litter should be thrown into his waste basket made a much greater impression on my mind than all my mother's efforts in the same direction.—Boston Transcript.

English Blacksmiths.

The deaths of country blacksmiths are nineteen per 1,000, those of Marylebone, London, thirty-one per 1,000. In the course of his life the country blacksmith can strike between the ages of twenty and sixty 36,000,000 blows on his anvil, 3,000 each day of ten hours; but the Marylebone blacksmith, who works twelve hours, has 600 more blows to strike per day—that is, sixty more working days per year, and in five years one whole year more of work—a full and sufficient reason, says Dr. Richardson, in combination with his unhealthier surroundings, for his shorter life.—London Tit-Bits.

How Riley Writes Poems.

James Whitcomb Riley, the Hoosier poet, is now living quietly at Indianapolis, devoting only a small portion of his time to literary pursuits. He is a sufferer from Bright's disease, and his condition is such as to give his friends considerable uneasiness. He is a most erratic writer, and many of the most charming poems from his pen have been dashed off under the inspiration of the moment. It is said that one of his later productions, that appeared in The Century, was originally written upon a cuff in a crowded railway train.—Chicago Mail.

THE tale of boodling in the Argentine Republic will undoubtedly set New York and Chicago wild. According to the reports the wildest dreams of the aldermen and county commissioners were surpassed in reality in the southern republic.

CHICAGO is greatly agitated over the news that horse steaks and likewise roasts are being exported to France by a New York firm. Things are comming to a pretty pass when the succulent pig of Illinois is compelled to compete with the pauper street car horse of New York and Brooklyn.

A WATERBURY (Conn.) girl who was unconscious sixteen days during an attack of the grip stoutly maintains that she went to heaven in the interval. The average citizen who has experienced the grip will just as stoutly maintain that the Waterbury young woman is mistaken in the place she visited.

THAT was not a half bad scene when a juryman rose in his seat and boldly questioned the Prince of Wales in the baccarat trial. The Prince responded as readily as would any other witness, and did not hurt himself in the opinion of Englishmen by doing so. But imagine a juryman questioning that young Emperor of Germany!

MRS. JAMES BROWN POTTER and Kyrle Bellew are reported to have made $100,000 in Australia, India and other oriental countries. Now let John Sullivan and Ann O'Delia Diss DeBar form a combination and follow suit. The tastes of the Southeastern World population evidently is not critical.

A DISPATCH from Lewiston, Ill., describes the terror and dismay caused by a tiger supposed to have escaped from a circus, and to be now roaming amid the bucolic inhabitants of that peaceful section. It may be the same tiger that tore up the prince of Wales so badly in the fastnesses of Tranby Croft. At any rate Sir Gordon Cummings ought to have a chance to identify the beast.

THE baccalaureate sermon of the president of Princeton college was on the topic "What is Truth?" and he hammered away for an hour or two to make his hearers understand what it was. As it was religious truth he was exploring for, he didn't make it altogether clear when he had finished. Other kinds are frequently self-evident, but this particular variety seems very hard to detect.

OUR exchanges are talking about an Italian immigrant who, landing at the Barge Office a few days ago, was so overjoyed at finding himself a free American that he dropped upon his hands and knees and kissed the ground. They omit to mention that, while he was at these interesting devotions, his pockets and belt were picked of a dagger, a razor, a case knife, a billet and a slungshot.

A GOAT'S digestion was sadly checked before it had finished on a lot of greenbacks on Levi Kalbach's farm in Heidelberg township, Reading, Pa. Heated with his work in the field, Farmer Kalbach hung his vest upon a fence post. In one of the vest pockets inclosed in a wallet were greenbacks to the amount of $41. In the field was Mr. Kalbach's pet goat. In the goat's stomach, when Kalbach returned, where the bank bills, most of the wallet and a large portion of the vest. Kalbach at once slaughtered his pet goat. All but $15 of the greenbacks had been properly chewed in aid of his goatship's digestion. The $26 thus chewed was past redemption.

THE population of British India, according to the census that was taken in February last, now runs up to 220,500,000, or an increase within ten years of 26,000,000. There is an additional population of 65,000,000 in those East Indian states that are under feudatory rule subject to British influence, with British protection. The peasants in some of the congested districts are seeking new homes in regions where the population is less dense than it is in the provinces of Bengal and Oudt. Mr. Gibson says that in the single province of Bengal, which has an area only one twenty-third as large as that of the United States, the population is 9,000,000 more than that of the American republic, though Bengal is almost wholly agricultural and has scarcely any large manufacturing centers. In that province there are 714 persons to every square mile of cultivatable land.

A TERRIBLE SCENE.

Over a Hundred Lives Lost By the Railroad Disaster Near Berne, Switzerland.

Scenes Remindful of the Heart-Rending Features of the Flood at Jamestown Pa.

BERNE, June 16.—The total number of people who lost their lives yesterday by the collapse of a railroad bridge on the Moenchenstein & Bale railroad is now placed at 120, with hundreds more or less injured.

It is feared that many others are dead, whose bodies have not been found.

Shortly after the first horror of the crashing of the engines and cars through the bridge and into the swiftly running stream had died away the survivors of the accident saw a scene which must have rivaled in horror the most heart-rending features of the Johnstown disaster in the United States.

Beneath the bridge, or what remained of it, was a hideous mass of broken car wheels, engines, railroad car upholstery, seats, mats, axles, broken glass and twisted tin work intermixed with still quivering heads bespattered with blood and brains, protruding arms and legs, bloody garments of all descriptions, hats and bonnets, umbrellas and parasols, hands and feet, while floating down the stream were numbers of dead bodies and faintly struggling men, women and children, a few of them uttering horrible cries of terror or emitting those fearful, gurgling, suffocating, moaning gasps peculiar to the drowning.

After the first moment of partial paralyzation which followed the revelation of this horror, the survivors did their utmost to rescue those whose lives were in danger. The work of pulling those who remained in the two suspended cars from the perilous position in which they were placed was one of great danger and difficulty and resulted in a number of instances of heroic conduct. In the meanwhile messengers were dispatched on all sides for medical relief, which was most urgently needed by whose distressing cries for help and prayers to God asking him to relieve them of their sufferings were most heartrending. Then everything possible was done by the survivors, but some time naturally elapsed before the physicians reached the spot. The troops and the firemen were the next to arrive, and they did good service in many ways, so much so that by nightfall about sixty bodies had already been recovered from the wreck and from the mountain stream into which the engine and cars of the excursion train had plunged.

When the relatives of the dead and wounded began to arrive and identified some of the victims there was another most awful series of incidents. The wildest grief was expressed on all sides, weeping and moaning filled the air, and several people were with difficulty retained from casting themselves headlong, rendered half-insane by grief, into the stream which flowed swiftly, unconcernedly, by the river banks strewn with the dead.

As night drew near enormous crowds of country people and citizens of Bale gathered around the fatal spot. There were many hundreds of people who gathered there solely in the hope of finding that some missing dear one had not perished by the crash, or, if such was the case, in the desire to take his or her body home and to prepare it for burial.

CRUSHED TO DEATH.

At the point where the accident occurred the river is only four feet deep. All who were killed, from seventy to eighty, were crushed to death, filling the air with shrieks and groans. As soon as possible the fire brigade of Basle and a detachment of artillery arrived, and the search for the dead was begun. Seventeen bodies falling close together were first taken up and laid in an adjacent orchard.

As the wreckage was cleared away the bodies of the dead and dying were found crushed together in ghastly confusion amid the almost inextricable mass of debris.

The whole night long the rescuers toiled, gleaning an occasional survivor out of the ruins. The moans of the injured heard in the early hours of the night ceased as death or rescue reached them.

Most of the bodies recovered were dreadfully mutilated. A dead mother was found holding in her arms her lifeless baby, while another child lay across her body. Several other family groups were seen joined by a common fate.

Relatives of the victims have been crowding the scene of the disaster to-day trying to identify the dead. Forty bodies, which lay in the freight shed were recognized mostly as those of inhabitants of Basle.

An exact estimate of the number of the killed is still impossible. There are several persons missing, and others who are in hospitals are sinking, end will probably have to be added to the ultimate total of the dead.

A Man Asks a Lawyer Whom He Defrauded to Defend Him.

HELENA, Mont., Special Telegram, June 16.—F. J. Ryan came here from St. Paul about the middle of April. He brought excellent letters of introduction, and soon secured employment with McConnell & Clayberg, attorneys, as bookkeeper.

His crookedness was discovered to-day and he was arrested. He was captured in the firm's office, and his nerve did not desert him. Coolly turning to Judge McConnell, he remarked: "Well, Judge, I suppose you will defend me?"

Three Thousand Men Strike.

CHICAGO, June 16.—The strike of architectural metal workers for a reduction of hours to eight per day and an increase in pay to 30 cents per hour, was inaugurated this morning as arranged. To-night it is estimated that three thousand men are out, and that to-morrow every shop in Chicago engaged in the manufacture of iron or brass ornament material will be shut down. The strike now includes metal workers, pattern makers, brass molders, shopmen and architectural iron workers. It affects forty manufacturing firms beside delaying the ornamental work in many buildings now in course of construction.

THAT SETTLES IT.

No Action to Be Taken by Parliament Regarding the Baccarat Scandal.

LONDON, June 16.—Hon. Edward Stanhope, secretary of state for war, replying to-day in the house of commons to a question put by Mr. Summers (Gladstone Liberal) in regard to the baccarat scandal, said that Sir William Gordon Cumming was the chief person who had broken faith, because he did not report the case to his commanding officer. If an offense was committed by any other person it could only have consisted in advising and pressing him to take a different course than laid down by the army regulations.

Of the three officers concerned, Gen. Owen Williams was a retired officer of the army and was, therefore, not subject to the regulations, but the other two—Field Marshal the prince of Wales and Lieut. Berkeley Levett—undoubtedly were. The former, said Mr. Stanhope, on looking at all the circumstances of the case, had authorized him, Mr. Stanhope, to say that he now saw that an error of judgment had been committed.

Lieut. Berkeley Levett, on the other hand, continued Mr. Stanhope, had written a letter to his commanding officer expressing deep regret that he had not acted in accordance with the army regulations.

Consequently, said the secretary of war in conclusion, it was not proposed to take any further action in the matter.

Mr. Cobb, who had announced his intention of questioning the secretary of war as to what action he intended to take in regard to the prince of Wales, Gen. Owen Williams and Lieut. Berkeley Levett for signing the document which allowed Sir William Gordon Cumming to remain an officer in the British army, although he was believed to have cheated at cards, etc., did not, in view of Mr. Stanhope's statement, put the question he had prepared.

There is a movement to expel Sir Edward Clarke from the clubs on account of his attack on the prince of Wales in the baccarat case. The queen and family are said to favor the movement. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge will take official notice of Sir William Gordon Cumming's accusation of unfairness in his charge. It is rumored that Sir William will be nominated for parliament by his Scottish constituents.

In his explanation of the Tranby Croft matter, Secretary for War Stanhope said this evening in the house of commons:

> The army regulations in question had undoubtedly never been specially brought to the notice of the prince of Wales, but when they had been, and looking back at all the circumstances of the case, the prince of Wales saw his error of judgment in not requiring Sir William Gordon Cumming to make an immediate report to his commanding officer. In his view I concur, but I should like to express my personal opinion that, had any one else suddenly heard that a friend who had greatly distinguished himself in the service had been accused of such an offense he would certainly hesitate before at once adopting a course that would bring an immediate and irretrivable blight on his whole future.

Interest in the baccarat questions attracted to the house of commons to-day the largest afternoon attendance of the present session. The speakers', strangers' and ladies' galleries were packed. The house, hushed and intensely expectant, listened eagerly to Mr. Stanhope's statement, which had evidently been carefully prepared. The announcement that Gen. Williams was already on the retired list surprised the group of radicals eager to attack him, and the prince of Wales's voluntary admission of an error of judgment on his part astonished and gratified the whole house and was received with slight cheering from the opposition benches.

The bulk of the opposition are averse to any further action and want the matter to rest where Mr. Stanhope left it.

NO QUESTION ABOUT IT.

It Was No Doubt Hot Enough for the Eastern People.

NEW YORK, June 16.—The record has been broken, and to-day will pass into history as the hottest 15th of June ever recorded, At 2:30 this afternoon the mercury indicated 97½ degrees. Reports from the leading cities in this state show that the intense heat is general. At Albany 98 is reported, while Hudson, the coolest place heard from, tells of 96.

BOSTON, June 16.—Heat advices from many towns in New England show a very sultry condition of things. The reports received from Maine points show a range from 82 to 90, the latter at Portland. Of eighteen towns in New Hampshire, but one shows below 90. In Massachusetts 92 is the lowest temperature reported, but the hottest place yet heard from is Providence, R. I., where the top notch of 107 was touched.

HARTFORD, Conn., June 16.—The thermometer here to-day registered 92 in the shade. Everything is dried up by drought.

PITTSBURG, June 16.—At the signal office to-day 93 was registered, though down in the streets 95 and 96 deg. were common. Many cases of prostration by heat are reported, though but two were fatal, an infant and a Slav serving woman. Several iron mills were obliged to suspend this afternoon, owing to the inability of the men to continue work.

QUIETLY SURRENDERED.

One of the Conspirators With Bardsley Returns to Take His Medicine.

PHILADELPHIA, June 16.—Henry W. Yard, the real estate promoter who was arrested in Trenton on Friday last, on the charge of conspiring with ex-City Treasurer John Bardsley, to misuse $200,000 of the city and state money, surrendered himself here to-day, and was released on $10,000 bail for a hearing.

At a meeting of the Association of Depositors of the Spring Garden National bank to-day, the following was adopted:

> That it is sense of this meeting that some arrangement be made whereby suit may be brought against the United States government to recover lost money, as the government is mainly responsible for our loss through the incapacity of its sworn officials.

Action will probably be taken by the executive committee of the association. Another resolution was also adopted instructing the secretary to write President Harrison, and ask him to inquire into the conduct of United States District Attorney Read, with regard to the arrest of officials of the Spring Garden bank.

It is claimed that at the time of the arrest of President Kent warrants were also out for Directors Graham, Pound, Nelson and Phillips, who were shown to be illegal borrowers from the bank. These warrants, the resolution sets forth, are still in the hands of Read, and the association wants to know why they have not been served.

"FRITZ" EMMETT DEAD.

Pneumonia Causes the Death of the Well Known Comedian.

CORNWALL, N. Y., June 16.—J. K. Emmett, the comedian, died here to-day of pneumonia. He had been in poor health for some time, but he had been confined to his bed but a few days.

Fire in the Philadelphia.

NEW YORK, June 16.—Fire was discovered in the forehold of the flagship Philadelphia at the navy yard this afternoon. The fire was soon put out and the hold was flooded with water. It was not known how the fire broke out. Some tar and varnish that were in the hold poured out their fumes so that it was difficult to work. Several men were overcome by the smoke and had to be pulled out. Joseph James, the captain of the hold, was burned. The fore hold is situated next to the magazine and under the ammunition room. The ammunition room and magazine were also flooded with water.

MARRIED AND PARTED.

"I wonder why she never married. She is a beautiful woman still. What must she have been when she was young? That chestnut hair of hers is more than tinged with gray, but the blue eyes are still bright and beautiful, and that pretty color of hers still comes and goes like a girl's. And how well she dresses! There is poetry and grace in every movement. If I didn't know she was an actress I should take her for some great lady; she walks like one, she talks like one and she looks like one."

"And you wouldn't be so very far out Nibbs, after all."

Thus old Sir John Protocol, K. C. B., formerly of the diplomatic service, to Nibbs, the hack writer. Both of them were elderly men; they had been schoolfellows, and Nibbs had married Sir John's sister when that gentleman was a boy at Eaton and, being brothers-in-law and having known each other all their lives, strange to say, they were still friends and cronies.

"Oh," said Mr. Nibbs, "she's a woman with a history, then?" and the old man's eyes began to sparkle till he looked like a dissipated vulture. "You'll have to tell the story, Jack, my boy. You couldn't have a better place to tell it in than this," said Mr. Nibbs, with a smile at the ceiling of the smoking-room of the Scarcophagus club.

"Well, if you want it," said Sir John, "I suppose you must have it. It was in 1856 that I first saw her—the year after the prince imperial was born, and Napoleon was at the zenith of his power. We all went to the Odeon from patriotic motives, for there was an English debutante who was about to make her first appearance, and Pugsley, the chancellor, had told us that she was desperately good looking. Her name was Sylvia Seton then and she's Sylvia Seton now. It's a wonderful thing, isn't it, Nibbs, that she ain't married?" And then Sir John concluded: "We'd none of us seen her. When I say 'we,' I mean the fellows at the embassy, from the second secretary down to me, and I was junior unpaid attache at the time, "She came into the chancellerie,' said Pugsley, 'herself, and she left a dozen programmes of her debut with me. That slip of a girl,' said Pugsley, 'walked into the office as though she were a queen. 'And so she was' he added, 'in the matter of beauty.' And then he began to rave about her eyes and her hair and her little pouting lips that were ruddier than the cherry, and the two little dimples that came into her cheeks when she smiled. 'And she is as good as gold, you know,' said Pugsley, 'for she wore darned gloves, and when a girl wears darned gloves you may swear that she's as good as gold."

"We all went to the Odeon, partly from patriotic motives, because Sylvia Seton was an English girl, but principally on account of the enthusiasm of Pugsley, who was a judge of beauty, and we were all amateurs of that article in those days," said Sir John Protocol with a sigh. "I can't for the life of me remember the piece," he continued, "but it was something, pastoral, poetical and pretty; the debutante was charming, sir—she was a dream of loveliness, was Sylvia Seyton; and the little English girl scored in the great, gloomy house that they called the second Theater Francais; and she signed a six month's engagement that very night with Botibol, the manager of the Port St. Martin. But she never played at the Port St. Martin, and the next thing we heard of Sylvia Seton was that she had married the Prince of Roxanbloxanfels Now the Prince of Roxanbloxanfels was a serene highness, and when his father died, he, being the eldest son, would become a grand transparency, a reigning monarch and an elector of the German Empire. But the Prince of Roxanbloxanfels was a brute—an ill-mannered boorish oaf who, if he had ever had any mind at all, had had it drilled out of him. He was a big man—a sort of tailor's lay figure of a man. He was perfectly miserable in the society of respectable women, and he was engaged to be married to the only daughter of the Prince of Roulettenburg. He was a fair man, with cold blue eyes and a retreating chin, and if anybody in Parisian society at that time had been asked to name the most dissipated man in the French capital he would undoubtedly have selected Conrad, Prince of Roxanbloxanfels.

"The way that fellow persecuted poor little Sylvia Seyton was monstrous. He sent her bouquets, he sent her diamonds, but his diamonds came back, and every night he use to turn up at the Odeon to glare like a hungry tiger at the charming little English ingenue. Sylvia Seyton wouldn't have anything to do with the prince. Then he tried to abduct her, and of course the matter was hushed up—equally of course it got into all the papers, and everybody knew perfectly well who Prince X. was, and how Mlle Z., as they called poor little Sylvia, had boxed his ears in indignation.

"That would have been enough to have choked off any ordinary man, but it didn't choke off Prince Conrad, and one day, to our intense astonishment, we heard that he had married her; and the pair appeared everywhere, and none of us were surprised to see that she looked very miserable indeed. But everybody said that she had played her cards wonderfully well; and the women all envied her diamonds, and the men all envied the Prince of Roxanbloxanfels. For my own part, being young and romantic at the time, I pitied the poor little English girl, for I knew that her husband was a drunken brute, a cruel, heartless ruffian, who would be sure to treat her badly sooner or later.

"'They'll probably have to buy you off in the end, mademoiselle?'

"'Perhaps I have failed to make myself understood, Mr. Pugsley,' said the lady. 'You are speaking, sir, to the wife of Prince Conrad of Roxanbloxanfels'.

"'Quite so,' said Pugsley, angry at being snubbed by the lady whose husband is about to be united to the Princess of Roulettenburg. 'Even princes,' he went on, 'don't as a rule, commit bigamy in this nineteenth century, Mme. la Princesse.'

"I could have kicked that brute Pugsley. But she never noticed the insult.

"'Mr. Protocol,' she said, will you take me to my carriage.' And as she said the words, whether she was a serene highness or only a little English player-girl, she looked a very queen—not a queen of the footlights, mind you but the genuine article.

"Then she favored Pugsley, who looked very foolish, with a condescending bow, and I gave her my arm and took her out to her carriage, which was a common hack cab. She evidently believed she was married to that triple brute, the Prince Conrad.

"'Have you any further commands, Princess?' I asked. 'All of us here, with the exception of Pugsley—who between ourselves, is an ass—are your devoted slaves. There's nothing we wouldn't do for you, and if you are in any difficulty or trouble we hope you will make use of us, for, Princess, we all love you for your talent, for your beauty, and for your pluck, and above all things, madame, because you are our countrywoman.'

"Within three months the Prince, her husband, left her, and he left her without a penny in the world. She didn't go back to the stage. She waited on in obscurity, living with her mother, and she made no sign until the approaching marriage of Prince Conrad, her husband, with Amelia of Roulettenburg was formally announced. And then she came to ask for advice at the legation. She told Pugsley, our chancellor, that a Catholic priest had married them in her mother's lodgings, she didn't know the name of the priest; she had no certificate of marriage. Pugsley gave her good advice.

"'My dear young lady," said Pugsley, "you are either legally married to Prince Conrad, or your marriage with his serene highness was a mere sham, in which case, as I am strongly inclined to suspect, the Prince will have brought himself within the French criminal law. Should your marriage have been a legal one Prince Conrad would not be so foolish as to go through an empty form of marriage with the Princess of Roulettenburg. The best thing you can do is to bide your time. Should this marriage take place you can set the criminal law in motion, and as a British subject you would have every assistance from the embassy here.'

"'And then if I succeed in proving my marriage, sir, I should ruin the life of the unhappy lady whom Prince Conrad is about to lead to the altar. Diplomacy is a machine that it takes a long time to set in motion, Mr. Pugsley, and I shall go to Roxanbloxanfels and complain.'

"She thanked me, and her lovely eyes looked all the brighter for the tears that stood in them as she did so.

"That night Sylvia Seton and her mother left Paris for Roxanbloxanfels.

"Now, the reigning monarch of Roxanbloxanfels was the father of his people. He was a tremendously virtuous monarch, and at the time I am speaking of virtuous monarchs upon the continent of Europe were very rare. Every Sunday morning it was the custom of the reigning Prince of Roxanbloxanfels to appear publicly on the broad walk that ran in front of the palace, and the Roxanbloxanfelsers, his loyal subjects, and the English tourists who were stopping at the neighboring baths at Klein Kohlwasser would come to see the sight. Nobody ever spoke to the reigning Prince as he headed the procession, the Princess upon his arm, of the royal family of Roxanbloxanfels. Behind him, two and two came the sixteen members of the royal family, eight princes and eight princesses, and all of them were virtuous—all except Conrad, the affianced husband of Princess Amelia of Roulettenburg, who, as you know, was a very bad one indeed.

"Now, Albrecht, reigning Prince of Roxanbloxanfels, was ambling along the center of the great gravel walk—his consort, the Princes Wilhelmine who was fat, fair and 50, upon his arm.

"The dear Conrad is feeling ill," said the Princess Wilhelmine to her august spouse; and certainly the dear Conrad looked exceeding unwell, for he suddenly turned very red, then he had grown very pale, and, still remaining white as a ghost, he looked, if possible, more foolish than usual.

"The Monarch turned to his son, the procession stopped and Prince Albrecht was about to inquire after his son's health when Sylvia Seton stepped out from the crowd, made Prince Albrecht a low courtesy, and placed a paper in his hand.

"'Permit me to introduce myself, your majesty, as the wife of your son, Prince Conrad," Thereupon the reigning Princess Wilhelmine fainted in the arms of her august husband, and gave a gentle scream; and the eight princesses, as one girl, each gave a little squeal and fainted in the arms of their eight princely brothers.

"Bocksbuetel! Where is Baron Bocksbeutel?" shouted his serene transparency, the Prince Albrecht.

"A little old man in a cocked hat, looking like the pictures of Baron Munchausen and covered with orders, stepped forward, saluted, and stood in attention.

"'Bocksbeutel said His Majesty with a melodramatic gesture, indicating Sylvia Seton, I commit this unfortunate lady to your charge. Poor thing, she is as mad as a hatter,' said His Majesty in a loud voice for the benefit of the bystanders. "By this time the Princess Wilhelmine and her daughters had come to, and then his Majesty gave the word of command. 'Vorwarts,' he cried, and the royal party moved on. When they reached the royal apartment Prince Conrad was placed under provisional arrest, and after he had dined (they always dined at 1 at Roxanbloxanfels, because they were so various) his Majesty Prince Albrecht sent for the crestfallen Conrad.

"'Conrad,' said His Majesty in a terrible voice, 'is it true that the eldest of my sixteen august children has disgraced himself?"

"'Pas si bete,' answered Prince Conrad, who was very proud of his French; 'we were married—ma loi, it was but a comedy, little father. The priest who performed the ceremony was my confidential valet,' and the Prince chuckled and smiled, and tugged at his great straw-colored moustache.

"For a whole minute his serene transparency the Prince Albrecht was lost in deep thought.

"'You deceived this young girl, then,' he said. 'Son Conrad,' said the Monarch, firmly, 'I am known as the most moral soverign in Europe; that title is very dear to me. Miserable boy, you must be married at once.'

"The luckless Prince Conrad fell upon his knees. He begged, he prayed; he vowed that the Princess Amelia of Roulettenburg was dearer to him than life. But His Majesty was not to be moved, and he rang the bell for the court chaplain. The prime minister was sent for, and the British envoy resident at the court of Roxanbloxanfels was hurriedly summoned. Within half an hour Sylvia Seton was married to Prince Conrad in the private chapel of the palace of Roxanbloxanfels.

"Bride and bridegroom parted forever at the altar rails. Sylvia Seton was now a serene highness, but she declined to have anything more to do with Prince Conrad. She refused the handsome provision offered her by her royal father-in-law. She left for Paris the same night. Within the week Prince Conrad committed suicied. I was going to say he blew his brains out, but that was impossible; but he did shoot himself through the head. The thing was a nine days' wonder.

"As for Sylvia Seton, she is Sylva Seton still. That's her story. Her sad dream of love and ambition was over and from that day to this, Nibbs, that woman worked like a slave. She might have married well a half dozen times had she pleased, but she will remain Sylvia Seton to the end of the chapter. Her story has been forgotten long ago."

"You're not asleep, Nibbs?" asked Sir John Protocol a little anxiously.

"Asleep, Jack my boy!" answered that gentleman. "Your story was most interesting and absolutely new to me. I know most of your stories, Jack," he added with a little yawn. "By the way, is there a word of truth in it?"

"Look in the 'Almanach de Gotha,'" said Sir John dryly.

"Let's have a brandy and soda," said Mr. Nibbs," and drink her health."

And they did.—St. James' Budget.

What a Good Woman Has Done.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the reformation wrought in the general tone of English society by Queen Victoria in the fifty years of her reign. The fierce light that beats about a throne has never been able to reveal a flaw in the purity of her personal character. All her life she has striven to promote public and private morality and decency, and the official example of the court which has been, openly at least, in the interest of cleanliess and decorum, has set a high standard for society in general, and has not been without its effect even upon the lower and more ignorant orders. Coarseness and profligacy are no longer regarded with admiration, and the clergy may again enjoy the respect due to religion and the professed union of church and state —From the Chautauquan.

A CONFUSION OF NAMES.

How an Actress Was Astonished by a Minister and Astonished Him.

Miss Jennie Yeamans, a bright actress, has apartments at the Leland. The number of her parlor door is 146. In room 246 is Mrs. Yeamans, a member of the Women's Christian Temperance Union from Boston. She lectures upon the evils of intemperance now and then. Recently a South Side minister called upon Mrs. Yeamans to ask if she would occupy his pulpit on Sunday evening.

The bell-boy who took his card upstairs also took one to Miss Yeamans from an interviewer. Miss Yeamans told the reporter to step up. Mrs. Yeamans was out. The bell-boy got his dates mixed up and told the preacher, to step up to 146. To the reporter he conveyed the word that the lady was out.

"This is Mrs. Yeamans?" asked the preacher as he was admitted to the parlor of the actress.

"Yes," was the answer, I was glad to receive your card."

"You are very kind. I have never had the pleasure of meeting you, though, I've been delighted with you on the stage."

"You flatter me, sir."

"Not at all. You have done a deal of good in the East, and I hope you will reap a glorious harvest here. Have you any engagement for Sunday night?"

"May I ask why?"

"I thought you would like to portray to my congregation the horrors of looking on the wine when it is red. We have not had a good temperance talk in our Church since Francis Murphy was here."

"Pardon me, sir; but while I practice temperance I do not preach it. What do I know about the remorse of a jag?"

At the word jag the minister jumped to his feet and asked whom he was talking to. When he was informed that Miss Yeamans, was not Mrs. Yeamans, the temperance lecturer, he went out of the room as if the cry of fire had been started.—Chicago Herald.

A PARROT YARN.

Baron Rothschild Is Made a Present of a Bird That Talks too Much.

The Baron de Rothschild of Paris, so runs the tale, was desirous of sending to his kinsman at Frankfort, whose birthday was at hand, some acceptable token of remembrance. I should fancy that a member of that family would be an exceedingly difficult person for whom to choose a gift, and so the Baron found. After much cogitation, and many investigations he decided upon a wonderfully trained and talkative parrot, whose faculty in learning any phrase that he had been told a few times was particularly noted. One of the clerks of the Paris House was deputed to convey the precious fowl to Frankfort. Now the weather was cold, the young man disliked travelling, and above all the parrot, with the usual perversity of his race, screamed and screeched all night, so that none of the occupants of the sleeping car in which he and his guardian were installed could get any rest. "Shut up, you confounded Jew!" exclaimed his protector in a passion more than once, moved to antisemitic feelings by the disagreeable journey and the parrot's bad behavior.

At last the bird and its disgusted protector arrived safe in Frankfort, and the parrot was formally presented to its new owners, who at once commenced trying to coax it to talk, Polly listened to M. de Rothschild's discourses for a few minutes, and then in reply enunciated with startling distinctness the latest phrase he had learned, "Shut up, you confounded Jew!"—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Electric Lights on Carriages

"Pretty nice turnouts I see along the boulevard," remarked William Furness, of the City of Mexico, who was looking out of one of the big windows of the Auditorium Hotel. "But there's one thing we have that I haven't seen in the United States. I mean the electric light attachment to a turnout.

"A Mr. Cazeaux, I think his name is, introduced them down there not long ago. And the other rich residents are having the attachments put on their carriages. It is the incandescent lamp fed by a storage battery placed under the driver's seat. From the battery wires extend to the two side lamps, to a small cluster in the top of the carriage inside and along the backs of the horses over their necks to a small lamp on their foreheads, between the eyes. If one likes he can have lamps of different colors distributed all over his carriage and horses and make a decidedly fetching effect." —Chicago Post.

MR. LEE. "Why, Addie, you needn't cry about it! I only said Mrs. Allen was a very well-informed woman, and I wished you would follow her example."

MRS. LEE. "Yes, and last week you said you wished I could manage to look as stylish as Mrs. Allen,—and she makes all her own clothes. But she has what I haven't."

MR. LEE. "What is that?"

MRS. LEE. "Well, she gets all of her information from the Magazine they take. I admit that she knows all that is going on, and is bright and entertaining in conversation: but I could do as well as she does if I had the same source of information. She lent me the last number of her Magazine lately, and I learned more in one hour's reading, about various social matters and the topics of the day, than I would pick up in a month by my occasional chats with friends. It certainly covers every topic of interest, from the news of the day down to the details of housekeeping; and everything is so beautifully illustrated, too. Every time Mamie goes over to the Allens' she comes back and teases me to get you to take Demorest's Family Magazine, as the stories are so good. Even the boys watch for it every month, as a place is found for them also in its pages; and Mr. Allen swears by it. It is really wonderful how it suits every member of the family!"

MR. LEE. "Well, perhaps I had better send for a Specimen Copy; for, if it is anything like what you say it is, it will amuse and instruct the whole of us."

MRS. LEE. "I see that W. Jennings Demorest, the publisher, 15 East 14th Street, New York, is offering to send a Specimen Copy for 10 cents, so we can't lose anything, as each number contains a 'Pattern Order' entitling the holder to any Pattern she may choose, and in any size—which alone makes each copy worth 30 cents; and I just want a jacket pattern like Mrs. Allen's. The subscription price is only $2.00 a year; and I must say I can't see how they can publish so elegant a Magazine for so little money."

Improved Passnger Service.

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Points For Campers

The Proper Clothing for Comfort and Health While in the Woods and Fields.

Selection of Camp—Putting up the Tent—Making the Bed —Insects Kept off.

The hundreds of thousands of boys everywhere in the United States and Canada who spend part of the summer in camp, few of them study carefully enough the methods adopted by persons of extensive camping experience.. There is no pleasure in a holiday spent in the wilderness unless the campers understand how to make themselves comfortable and to avoid the discomforts that fall to the lot of the average greenhorn.

Yet the whole thing is very easy to learn. For those who do not want to think out the subject for themselves let me give a few suggestions as a result of my own experience for a number of years of camp life, as well as the experience of a number of friends of mine.

PROPER CLOTHING.

I always use a Norfolk Jacket—called in this country Oxford jacket or belted coat—made loose, of strong homespun and capable of being worn open when it is warm or belted tight when the weather is cold. This coat looks quite sportsmanlike. The cap is a matter of choice, but I like best the deer stalker, which receives in this country the very obvious name of fore-and-after. It should be of the same color and material as the coat. To be thoroughly de riguer for wild life the camper should wear homespun or corduroy knickerbockers with black or gray stockings, unless the region where he places his camp is badly plagued by mosquitoes, when he had better wear trousers, as the fly pests will but their bills clean through the stockings. The stockings should be of wool and ribbed. For lying about the camp, boating, canoeing, or light training, thin yellow leather and sometimes canvas shoes might be used, but for all heavy work there is nothing like a solid boot, roomy, with wide sole and wide heel, laced tightly about the ankle and resembling the old fashioned English shooting boot.

Be careful in making up your kit. If you have long and rough travel and any portaging, never take a box, no matter how many patents are attached to it or how convenient it may look on the tradesman's counter. It is inconvenient to carry in a boat and impossible to carry through the woods. I know nothing better than a good substantial bag made of oiled canvas, thoroughly watertight, and arranged so it can be laced snugly together. I have seen leather bags also, which served the purpose admirably.

KIT FOR A CAMPER.

Each camper requires a pair of blankets, gray or dark red; the clothing I have mentioned, say two large crash towels, soap, small hand glass, comb and brush, tooth brush and paste, needles, thread, thimble and buttons, a couple of pairs of old gloves, scissors, pocket knife, belt sheath and sheath knife, a small bottle of arnica, bottle of Jamaica ginger, a book of court plaster, a bottle of citrate of magnesia in powders, and two or three bottles of laxative pills, as advised by hysician. If you propose to camp at some place far away from a grocery store you must of course take your provisions along, and here comes the most troublesome part of your outfit. you must have tea, coffee, bag of salt, sugar, syrup, biscuits, pepper, mustard, vinegar and curry. I am a strong advocate of canned food for the camp, and in this form should have beef, lobster, salmon, tongue and perhaps tomatoes and corn. Butter is also necessary, but it possible get it from the nearest farm house. Better take along also a bag of prepared flour, buckwheat and rice, and above all, some tins of good, condensed milk. Condensed coffee is also an excellent article. You can have also prepared soups, choclate, etc which adds to the luxury of camp life. But be careful overweighting your baggage. Of course there is no comfort in camping unless you take a tent, and the "A" structure, in my judgment, is the best. Sufficient attention is not always given to the selection of a camp site. In choosing spot several considerations should weigh. It should be erected on a dry spot, and the ground should fall away from it at least on one side so as to drain the water.—New York Herald.

Capital Gossip.

Special to the NEWS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22d, 1891.—Every body laughed when, at the time the Senate was considering the McKinley bill, Senator Edmund and one or two other New Englanders insisted that the bounty on sugar should be extended to the makers of mapel sugar as well. It was so done, and now comes the fun. The owners of the maple trees are beginning to think that they have not a bonanza after all. It is going to cost them more to get bounty than it is worth. The law gives a bounty of abont two cents a pound, so that all the bounty realized on 1000 pounds, which is a good average yield, will be $20. To secure this a farmer must take out a license and submit his product to the Government Inspector to be tested, weighed, etc. Furthermore, as the Inspector may not get around on time, the farmers say they may miss the opening of the market in the first part of the maple sugar season, when the product commands about six cents a pound more than it does later in the season.

The composition of the new land court is a great surprise to the politicians. Not a single member of the new court has national fame. Even Mr. Reed, the Chief justice of the Court, though a member of the last House of Representatives, was so silent a member that he never became known outside of his committee room. There is great surprise that Ex-Congressman Payson, of Illinois, was passed over. It was almost the universal opinion that he would be the Chief Justice of the new court.

Preparations are now in progress at the Navy department for one of the most exhausted tests of armor plates ever conducted in any country. The Annapolis trials of September last with the foreign plates, when the superiority of the homogenous plate over the compound was clearly demonstrated, and the test of a few weeks ago with three inch American plates, while important, sink into insignificance when compared with the forthcoming tests to be held next month at Indian Head, on the shore of the Potomac, thirty miles south of Washington. It will not only be a test of American plate, but the American guns and projectiles, and it will demonstrate what our naval ordnance authorities have been doing in the development of important war materials within the past few years. The chief object of the trial will be to determine definitely the best armor plate with a view of its formal adoption as a standard for naval purposes. Eight plates in all will be represented. They will each be 10½ inches thick, 6 feet wide, and 8 feet long. They will include all steel, steel with nickle allow, steel treated by the Harvey process, and steel and nickle alloy treated by the same process. American made 6 inch and 8 inch guns, with American made Firminy shells and a few Holtzer projectiles, will be used in the trials.

The farmers' Alliance movement is making itself felt in the South in in direct ways that gives politicians cause to feel serious. Members of Congress from the strongest and most reliable Southern Districts no longer affect to treat the movement slightly. They admit confidentially that their constituents are doing a heap of thinking on their own account these days. A Southern congressman whose district gives him a big majority every two years and who has practically no opposition says: "In the last campaign, for the first time in my experience, I found that the old-time highfalutin speeches wouldn't go. They didn't enthuse the people as they used to do. They wanted serious talk; and, what was more, they asked intelligent questions about matters of which in former years they knew nothing. This sort of thing nonplussed me at first. I didn't know what to make of it. I was unprepared for anything of the kind. I saw at once, that they had been reading and thinking, and that I would have to take a new tack. I answered their questions as best I could in the frankest manner possible. They were about the tariff, Government finances, the expenditures by Congress, and about my own course. They cross examined me like lawyers; but I stood up to it and came out all right. My majority was larger than ever. But let her tell you the Farmers Alliance movement is working out results that will surprise some people, and it doesn't do to underestimate its force."

That Natural Gas Well.

From the Warren Sheaf.

Natural gas was struck on the farm of Mr. J. H. Huggard, about a mile west from this city, on Friday afternoon last, while drilling for water at a depth of 98 feet. The gas escapes with a terrific roar that may be heard for some distance around. The gas was accidently ignited from a lantern in the evening on the same day it was discovered, the flame rising skyward thirty feet or more, partly burning the derrick and endangering the barn and other buildings of Mr. Huggard. Pebbles have been thrown fifty feet in the air, and particles of mud are ejected with much force. The gas is easily ignited by a match, and burns with a whitish light slightly tinged with blue, and since the first great outburst, the flame has kept at an average height of 5 ft. More water is being emitted now than at first, so the well will, it seems, serve a double purpose. The two great opposing elements, fire and water, are here intimately blended, both proceeding from the same aperture, and presenting a novel and fantastic scene. The Huggard premises have been besieged daily by eager throngs of visitors from the city and also from afar, viewing the truly wonderful well.

Ice Cream.

There are many ways of making ice cream, poor ways and good ways, but the following recipes, from Fred May, will doubtless please the average reader of the NEWS who tries them:

New York Cream—Three quarts cream, 18 eggs, two pounds sugar and flour, with vanilla. Put two quarts of cream into a Farina boiler over a quick fire; rub half the whites and all the yolks of the eggs with the sugar to a smooth paste; beat in the hot cream, place on the fire again and stir until it forms a thick coating on the spoon; now strain and cool; beat the remainder of the cream to a thick foam, add the custard flour and freeze.

Vanilla Cream—Three quarts cream, one pound, 8 ounces of sugar, one quart of milk and the whites of 8 eggs. Cook the one quart of milk same as above, stiring constantly. Beat the eggs until they become smooth, add the sugar to the milk now when it reaches the boiling point; take it from the fire, strain through a fine seive or strainer and place on ice to cool. Now beat the cream in a pan over ice or in a cool place until it is thick, then beat in your sweeting until all is smooth, and add extract of Vanilla to your taste. When frozen cover well and allow it to stand one hour before using.

Almond Ice Cream.—Add two pounds of almonds chopped fine or ground and do not flavor two strong with the vanilla; give it a few drops of bitter almond and a dash of rosewater.

Lemon Cream.—Grate the rind of four lemons and allow the joice of one for each quart; soak the grated rind in a little hot water and strain through a napkin with the juice. Do not add this until the cream is frozen, and then work it well in with a wooden spoon.

THE HOME MARKET CLUB ON THE WOOL DUTY.

The Great Protectionist Club Puts Its Foot in It—Says that Wool Prices Are Lower Under Protection—The Argument to the Farmer and to the Manufacturer—A Fast and Loose Game.

The great Home Market Club, of Boston, has just struck a deadly blow at the duty on wool. This club was organized for the special purpose of propagating the notion that the agricultural classes of the country are benefited as much by protection as the manufacturers themselves, since protection creates a home market, in which the farmer can sell his produce—never mentioning the fact, of course, that this same home market will not pay one penny more for such produce than the despised foreigner will pay.

Recent developments in the woolen industry have brought before the lords of the Home Market Club the greatest problem which they have yet had to face. Many of the best woolen manufacturers in New England have joined in an organized effort to secure the removal of the wool duties; and the Home Market Club has recently published a pamphlet to convert these manufacturers from their error. This pamphlet is entitled, "Protection of Wool—From the Standpoint of the Manufacturer."

Every farmer who grows wool ought to send to the Home Market Club for a copy of this pamphlet in order to see the style of argument used upon the manufacturer, and to compare this with the arguments made to the farmer. The protectionists are loud and earnest in their defense of the wool duty before farmers, since, as they claim, it increases the prices of American wool.

Last fall when McKinley was running for Congress his backers went all over his district offering to make contracts to buy up all the sheep in it at $5 a head in case McKinley should be elected. This meant high wool duties, high wool prices.

But the great Home Market Club takes exactly the opposite line of argument. It defends the wool duty on the expressed ground that it keeps the price of American wool lower than it would be under free wool. This protectionist club seeks to prove to the manufacturers that the price of wool in this country for the past ten years has been from one cent to nine cents per pound lower than it has ever been abroad, and that the American farmer could have sold his wool from one cent to nine cents higher in Liverpool or London than he could sell it on his farm.

Here are its words, which are printed in its pamphlet in large type, as the final argument and last appeal to the wool manufacturer:

"It is a mistaken idea with many manufacturers that foreign prices of wool are necessarily lower than home prices under protection. They average higher. They would be much higher but for a large and certain domestic supply. The following table is instructive."

Here is the table it gives:

	Foreign average price of all wools at port of exportation without duty. Cts., lb.	Average price of all American wools at the farm. Cts., lb.
1881	31 1-5	31
1882	31 9-10	30
1883	34 2-5	29
1884	29 1-10	26
1885	32 1-10	23
1886	32 1-5	24
1887	29 1-10	24

Here the wool grower may see what a fast and loose game the protectionists have been playing with him. They have been carrying water on both shoulders, telling the farmer that the wool tariff makes the prices high, and then facing about and drawing tables of figures to show to the manufacturer that it makes prices lower.

In this connection it may be of interest to the farmer to note the difference in domestic wool prices now and last year. Here are the quotations from the Boston wool market for some of the best-known wools last August and for the current month:

	Aug. 7, 1890. Cents.	June 11, 1891. Cents.
Ohio and Pa. XX and above	33@34	31½@32
Ohio X and above	32@32½	30 @31
Ohio No. 1	37@37½	35 @36
Michigan X	28@29½	28 @29
Michigan No. 1	36@36½	34 @35
Michigan unmerchantable	22@33	21 @22

Is it not time that farmers open their eyes to simple and indisputable proofs like this that a high wool duty does not raise the price of his wool? However deeply set the Republican wool-grower may be in the notion that the wool duty helps him, ought he not to listen and be convinced when the greatest protectionist club in the land agrees that the duty keeps prices down? Let such a wool-grower send to the Home Market Club for its wool pamphlet and see for himself. It is doubtful, however, whether he can get the pamphlet for love or money, if he makes it known that he is a grower of wool.

The Tax on Gloves.

The glove paragraphs of the McKinley law show how much more heavily that measure bears upon the poor than upon the rich.

On silk gloves the old duty was 50 per cent., and this was increased by the McKinleyites to 60 per cent., which is an increase of 20 per cent. upon the old rate. Upon cotton gloves, however, the old tariff rate of 35 per cent. was changed to 50 per cent., or an increase of 43 per cent. upon the old rate.

The same inequality is seen in the case of leather gloves. Under the old tariff the duty on all kinds of leather gloves was 50 per cent. ad valorem; the McKinleyites changed the duty to an ad valorem rate, claiming that the new specific rates were equivalent to the old rate. But this is not the case. The duties are so arranged that they run far above 50 per cent. on the cheaper kinds. On men's plain gloves, for example, the present duty is one dollar a dozen and 50 per cent. ad valorem. On gloves worth $3 per dozen, therefore, the present duty is equivalent to 83 per cent., while on gloves worth $6 the duty is only 66 per cent.

The same thing is found in the duties on women's kid gloves. Some time after the new law went into effect the New York Dry Goods Economist pointed out its effects upon these goods by saying: "In women's gloves the cheapest kid will be forced out of the American market, for the duty imposed on them is all out of proportion with the value of the goods, which are those patronized by the poorer classes, who are supposed to be assisted by the new duty."

Woolen gloves, which are worn mainly by the poorer people, come in for an enormous advance. Under the old law these were taxed at from 10 to 35 cents per pound and 35 to 40 per cent. ad valorem—making single duties ranging from 63 to 73 per cent. Under the McKinley law all woolen gloves are taxed as "wearing apparel" at 49½ cents a pound and 60 per cent. ad valorem. This of course lays the heaviest burden on the cheapest goods.

THE AGRICULTURAL MINNOW.

Why He Cannot Be Pin-Hooked—Protection Helps Him Not—Europe's Demand for Wheat.

Minnows will bite readily at an unbaited pin-hook to the great delight of the small boy. A similar unbaited pin-hook was thrown into the agricultural pool by the McKinleyites in the shape of increased duties on wheat and corn, but the agricultural minnow will not bite. Although the price of corn is double what it was a year ago, and the price of wheat is very much higher, too, no farmer has yet been found who is silly enough to say that McKinley's increased duties have had the effect of raising prices by even a fraction of a cent. Not even the wildest or most rabid McKinleyite organ, either, has ventured to claim the increased prices as among the "benificences" of the new tariff law.

"Why is this thusness?" The farmer is too well informed to believe that McKinley's wheat and corn duties can be worth a tin whistle to him, since he is selling millions of dollars' worth of these very products in foreign markets; and the McKinleyites are too well aware of this to try to force the naked pin-hook into his mouth. They know too well that the farmer will "shy off" under such treatment.

The main factor in raising the prices of wheat and corn, aside from our own shortness of crops last year, is the large demand certain to come from Europe for this year's crops, owing to an unusually bad wheat crop this summer. Already it is reported from New York that freight engagements are being made with the great steamship lines far out into the fall months for transportation of grain to Europe; and it is already predicted that Europe will take more of our wheat and corn this year than ever before.

That is a pin hook with a fat bait on it, and no deception about it. McKinley tries to belittle the foreign market, asking "what particular sanctity hangs about it." At any rate, the foreign market is a mighty good place to sell wheat and corn; and McKinley's agricultural minnows, though they refused utterly to bite at his naked pin-hook duties, are quite intelligent enough to see that the more freely we buy Europe's products the more largely will Europe buy of us. And the farmer is quite willing to pay for those foreign goods on a basis of what James G. Blaine calls "friendly barter." We ship away our surplus which we do not need and ship back Europe's surplus, and both parties are richer by the operation. The agricultural minnow knows this, and hence the "reciprocity" bid for his vote.

Protection by False Pretenses.

One of the most frequent arguments before the Ways and Means Committee, at Washington, from people who want new duties imposed or new ones increased, is that such duties will develop home competition, that this will force prices down, and the consumer will be benefited. None of these applicants for Government aid will confess that the protection asked for will keep prices up.

On the contrary, we see the singular spectacle of hundreds of men paying the expenses of a trip to Washington to ask for duties on their goods, on the ground that those duties will bring prices down. Before the committee these men have much to say about promoting competition; they seem, in fact, to have overcome the law upon which every business man proceeds—the law that the less competition there is the greater profits will be. Every business man dislikes competition; but a deputation to Washington on behalf of any industry always appears to be willing to have as much home competition as any consumer could possibly wish. When, however, competition or other causes have reduced prices competition becomes unpopular, and the result is the formation of a trust to defeat the very competition which the manufacturers profess to be so anxious to promote.

Are we to believe that the manufacturers are so superpatriotic that they wish more competition and lower prices, and all this for the good of the dear people? The numerous trusts and combines to prevent competition and raise prices are a sufficient answer to this question. Are we to believe that they want protection in order to raise wages? The great number of wage reductions since the McKinley law was enacted is satisfactory proof to the contrary.

The truth is that manufacturers, like everybody else, want to put as much money into their own pockets as possible. The difference is that they run to Congress with false and hypocritical pleas to get laws which will enable them to feather their nests at public expense, while the great masses of consumers and 9 per cent. of all the producers of the country are trying, by hard labor and small savings, to gather about them a modest portion of this world's goods.

Our Thriving Shoddy Business.

Last year, when the McKinley bill was before Congress, and many woolen manufacturers were opposing its increased duties on wool, it was said by the New York Dry Goods Economist that, "Manufacturers of goods from wool substitutes applaud the measure before Congress and are championing its proponents and abettors."

The shoddy men were right in their forecast of the effect of the bill on their industry. They judged that by putting heavy duties on foreign wool, the new law would increase the use of shoddy and give the shoddy business a great boom. Well, the boom has come, in fact, it has been here ever since the McKinley law was passed.

The following table, giving the prices of different kinds of shoddy in the Boston market last August and at the present time, will show that the confidence of the shoddy men in the McKinley law was not misplaced:

As an index to the present situation of the shoddy business the following from the latest number of the Dry Goods Economist will prove instructive: "During the past six months the building of new shoddy mills and the extension of old ones have been of frequent report. * * * The most curious feature in this connection is that the largest manufacturer of all-wool shoddies is in Ohio, the home of the finest flocks. Another mill in that State is making such additions that by running double time, which it is reported it will do as soon as it begins operations, it will rank as the second concern of the kind in the country."

The same paper estimates the shoddy consumption of the country at 80,000,000 pounds, "or a quantity that equals one-fourth the wool clip of the country." The shoddy and other wastes consumed in 1880 was 52,000,000 pounds. Are we not rapidly becoming a shoddy nation under the wool tariff?

THE STARCH TRUST.

HISTORY OF A SPECIMEN TARIFF COMBINE.

Dividing the Spoils for Six Months—A Case of High Protection Where None Is Needed—A Prosperous Industry Exporting Its Product—How Home Market Prices Have Advanced.

A few years ago the manufacturers of corn starch were loudly complaining that there was no money in their business; but a little more than a year ago they formed a large trust composed of practically all the manufacturers of starch in the country, and now they are happier. Before the trust was formed the price of corn starch at the factories was as low as 2¼ cents a pound, but as soon as the trust was formed in March, 1890, prices at once took an upward jump, and now range from 3¼ to 3½ cents.

The trust having gotten in its work of raising prices, the business is now announced by a responsible trade paper to be very profitable. As an evidence of this it is stated that the National Starch Manufacturing Company, or starch trust, just declared a semi-annual dividend of 6 per cent on the second preferred stock. What the first preferred stockholders received is not stated.

Last year, about the time that the trust was formed, a careful estimate was made by a prominent starch dealer showing that a starch factory could easily earn 38 per cent. clear profit on its capital. This estimate was said to be made on actual facts, the factory in question having a capital of $100,000, grinding about 1,500 bushels of corn per day, and running 300 working days in a year. Corn could then be had at 30 cents a bushel; but, though the price is now more than twice that figure, this difference is more than counterbalanced by the higher prices for starch exacted by the trust.

The McKinley duty on corn starch is 2 cents a pound, the same as under the new law. Notwithstanding the valiant talk of sundry Republican statesmen about reducing duties, in cases where a domestic industry is controlled by a trust, no effort was made by the McKinleyites to lower the starch duty. This duty was equivalent at the time when the trust was formed, to 88 per cent. of the factory price of American starch.

If there is any industry in the whole country which needs absolutely no protection, that industry is the starch business. Why so? Because our starch manufacturers have demonstrated their ability to compete in the markets of the world against the starch made by the so-called "pauper labor" of every country. They sold nearly 20,000,000 pounds in foreign countries during the two fiscal years 1889 and 1890—the greater part of this being, of course, corn starch. Of the exports last year, 2,000,000 pounds went to England and 4,600,000 to the Netherlands.

If our manufacturers are able to send so much starch to foreign countries, why is it necessary to protect them at home against those same countries? Could anything more absurd be imagined? The only purpose this starch tariff can serve, is to enable our precious home-market starch trust to put up prices to the domestic consumer, while perhaps selling at lesser prices abroad.

Difference in Gold.

"Most people suppose," says an assayer, "that all gold is alike when refined, but this is not the case. An experienced man can tell at a glance from what part of the world a gold piece comes, and in some cases from what part of a particular gold district the metal was obtained. The Australian gold, for instance, is distinctly redder than the Californian, and this difference in color is always perceptible, even when the gold is one thousand fine. Again, the gold obtained from the placers is yellower than that which is taken directly from quartz. Why this should be the case is one of the mysteries of metallurgy, for the placer gold comes from the veins. The Ural gold is the reddest found anywhere. Few people know the real color of gold, as it is seldom seen unless heavily alloyed, which renders it redder than when pure. The purest coins ever made were the $50 pieces that used to be made in California. Their coinage was abandoned for two reasons: first, because the loss by abrasion was so great, and, secondly, because the interior would be bored out and lead substituted, the difference in weight being too small to be readily noticed in so large a piece. These octagonal coins were the most valuable ever struck.

A PROTECTIONIST organ rejoices that the tariff reduced the price of galvanized iron sheets from 7¾ cents a pound in 1880 to 4¼ cents in 1889. This is used as an argument to show that the tin-plate duty will have a similar effect, since "tin plate is only sheet iron dipped in tin." But the average price of foreign tin plates for that same year (1889) was 2 8-10 cents per pound. How can we beat that when our galvanized iron is itself 4¼ cents?

THE Mosque of St. Sophia in Constantinople is always fragrant with the odor of musk, and has been so for hundreds of years, ever since it was rebuilt in the ninth century, the curious part of it being that nothing is done to keep it perfumed. The solution to the seeming mystery lies in the fact that when it was built, over 1,000 years ago, the stones and bricks were laid in mortar mixed with a solution of musk.

THE first iron-plate furnaces in this country were built in Virginia between 1714 and 1730, under the old Colonial Governor Spotswood. Yet in the year of grace 1891 we are still protecting pig iron as an "infant industy." A hoary infant that!

HER OLD CHARGE IN DANGER.

Aunt Maria's Efforts to Save Her Master From the Telephone.

There is a well-to-do young Southern man in this city who lives in a handsome residence not far from Central Park, and he has among other valuable possessions a family of seven children.

He had been "brought up" by an old negro "mammy" somewhere near Alexandria, Va., and when his wife recently suggested that another nurse be secured for the children his thoughts reverted to Aunt Maria. He decided to bring the old negress here, and in a few weeks she was comfortably installed in the nursery, much to the awe of the northern born young southrons, who were not familiar with institutions of a bygone age and who did not quite understand Aunt Maria's authority.

The young man had a telephone in his house, and as the old negress had never heard of that invention she looked upon it at first with wonder and then with suspicion. The jingling bell, receiver and other neccessary adjuncts were more than Aunt Maria's mind could master. She would never go near "dat debbil's t'ing nohow."

Finally, one day last week S. rang up from his office, and after a brief conversation requested his wife to send the old woman to the telephone. A great deal of persuasion was required to make her consent, but she was finally induced to place the receiver at her ear and listen.

"Is that you, Aunt Maria?" inquired S. over the wire.

An expression of astonishment spread over the old woman's countenance, quickly followed by one of awe and another of fear. For several minutes she stood bewildered, and then she shouted:

"L-L-Lawd a massa, Mars' Randolp'! How you done git down dar?"

Then she decided that he could not but be in danger. "Come out'en it!" she cried. "Youse up to some more dem pranks like when yo' was a chile. Come out'en it! You'll git hurt. I'se comin' den arter you," and with that she started toward the street door.

Mrs. S. had hard work to keep Aunt Maria at home until "Mars' Randolp'" arrived. She refused to have matters explained, but abjured him by everything not "to go down dar again."

She has never gone near the telephone since.—New York Herald.

A NEEDED LESSON.

Why She Suspended for a Time Her Literary Labors.

One of the younger literary women, who has made the beginning of an excellent reputation, though she is too young to have become as yet widely known, makes the statement that she has definitely and for some years laid down her pen. The reason she gives for resigning the foothold she has struggled for are not without interest. "I have noticed for some time," she says, "that I have been unable to be ordinarily civil to my little girl. I am busy and I cannot keep my temper when, in the middle of a paragraph, baby interrupts me. The climax came just a few days ago. The child entered the library a few minutes before lunch hour, walking slowly and timidly. She came to my desk and put a little bowl in front of me. 'Mamma,' she said, 'I have picked up thirty-six dandelion blossoms.'

"'Thank you,' I answered, 'I will look at them while I am writing.'

"A minute after I heard her in the next room with her grandmother. 'Grandma,' she said, 'mamma really stopped writing to thank me.'

"I threw down my pen. If it seemed strange to my baby that I thanked her, it is time I stopped bookmaking."—New York Recorder.

East Indian Barbers.

The natives of India are very ingenious workmen, but their tools are of the most primitive kind. Strange to say, a sword made by the native workmen will not rust under ordinary circumstances, and the material is infinitely superior to the best that Sheffield or Birmingham can turn out. I have often been shaved by an East Indian in Jamaica, to which place they are brought to work the sugar plantations, and have never had it so well and comfortable done either in America or England; yet his razor, to look at, seemed like one purchased at a 10-cent store. These barbers carry with them a little brass cup or miniature basin filled with plain cold water. Dipping one finger in the water from time to time, he rubs in the water all over the part to be shaven; no soap or substitute is used; then he applies his razor, and it glides over your skin evenly and smoothly, and though he goes over each part but once he leaves your skin smooth as an infant's cheek. Each batch that comes over to Jamaica has its own barber, as none but one of their caste may cut their hair.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette

Inexhaustible Ingenuity.

The resources of the advertising inventor are endless. A toy gun for posting advertisements is among his latest inspirations. It is used for shooting advertising arrows into trees, fences, buildings, or any inanimate objects. The arrow is feathered with light cardboard of various colors bearing in large type any desired inscription. Two sections of the cardboard and the resultant angles are embraced by a cross slit kerf, the rear of the stick being wound with cord and the point sharpened to increase penetration. The advertising darts can thus be projected out of ordinary reach, but just high enough not to escape the notice of the passer-by.

A COSTLY RUSSIAN OEBSQUIES.

An Attempt Made to Conceal the Death of the Grand Duke Nicholas, In Order to Avoid the Expense of Escorting the Body.

When it became evident that the Grand Duke Nicholas could not survive for more than a few days, an order was sent from St. Petersburg that his death was to be concealed and that his body was to be secretly brought to the capital, in order that it might be announced that he died on the journey. The object of this manœuvre was to save the fearful expense of the elaborate ceremonial which Russian etiquette prescribes on the occasion of the death of a field marshal, which includes the stationing of a double line of soldiers all along the route between the place of death and the place of burial, and what this signified in the case of Nicholas will be appreciated by any one who reflects upon the distance between the Crimea and St. Petersburg.

By the indiscretion of some functionary, who has, no doubt, been packed off to Siberia, the fact of the demise of the grand duke was allowed to transpire, so the elaborate scheme of deception which had been arranged was abandoned, to the rage and disgust of the emperor, who has not relished the expenditure of £50,000, at least, upon the obsequies of his disreputable uncle, whom he would have shot or banished in 1878 if he had then been czar. The coffin of the grand duke was escorted from the Crimea to St. Petersburg by a military suite of about 200 persons including twenty-four colonels, and, in order to comply with the usual ceremonial, whole armies in the south and centre of Russia have been displaced.

Moltke and Bismarck.

The memory of their joint past certainly ought to have brought Bismarck to the bier of Moltke, apart altogether from personal feeling. Of that, in the sense of friendship, there was not much between the two men. Often their relations were very much strained, and there was a period at Versailles when they were not on speaking terms and communicated by letter. The King an Moltke habitually thought together. Bismarck often differed from them, and when he put down his foot he was the master man. Wilhelm and his General were set on entering Vienna after Koniggratz, but Bismarck overruled them and concluded the convention of Nikolsburg. They were keen to go to war with France then, because of her officious interposition and heated threats; indeed, the order went to Roon to mobilize 350,000 fresh troops. "One at a time," was Bismarck's fiat, and he prevailed. Again, in 1867, he overrode the joint eagerness of monarch and General to have it out with France. When it was neccessary, as the night of Sedan, when poor Wimpfen was the toad under the harrow which the pair dragged backware and forward over them, Moltke and Bismarck joined hands; but Busch's book is full of expressions of irritation against Moltke on Bismarck's part during the Versailles period, and the latter never forgot nor forgave Wilhem's words to Moltke in the Galerie des Glaces, that to him he owed the imperial dignity.—London World.

Veterans and Raw Recruits.

While every soldier admits the great superiority of veterans to raw troops, occasionally cases arise in which the latter are better suited to accomplish the purpose desired. A marked instance of this occurred at the battle of Chickamauga. Gordon Granger came up with his troops just at the time when Thomas' men were reeling under the assaults of superior numbers, and could not have held their ground much longer. It was necessary to check an impending charge by a counter attack, but this had to be made under circumstances greatly disadvantageous to the attacking force. Granger had plenty of veterans, but he sent three green regiments to make the charge, which accomplished its object, although at tremendous loss. When asked for the reason for the selection, he replied that veteran troops, who fully understood the situation and the risks that they were running, would not be likely to press home a hopeless assault, but that raw recruits would go headlong forward because they did not know their danger. The event proved that his judgement was well founded, and was one of the many instances of soldierly feeling and knowledge of men that earned him the title of "Granger Great in Battle."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Bangor's Unique Welcome.

While Gen. Grant was president he visited Maine accompanied by several members of his Cabinet, to formally open the then American and European railroad, running from Bangor to the New Brunswick line.

Bangor had never been honored by the presence of a "first citizen" before, and the city was dressed in gala garb to receive him. It so happens that the most imposing structure in the city is the jail, and it has extensive grounds and shade trees in front of it.

When the procession from the railroad station had reached the grounds the General's attention was called to the crowning feature of the decorations. A large floral arch had been constructed at the entrance bearing the inscription:

"WELCOME."

"Ah," said the General, much pleased, "what public building is that?"

"The jail," replied a member of the committe, and then for the first time the blunder of it dawned upon them, and that committee felt as despicable as a drink of prohibition whiskey.—New York Herald.

Petroleum and Drunkenness.

The number of remedies—not to say nostrums—which have from time to time been vaunted as specifics for alcoholism is legion, some of the latest being red cinchona, strychnine, ichthyol, phosphorus, hydrobromate of hyoscine, and hydrastis. The most recently suggested remedy is petroleum, or paroffine oil, to which the attention of the St. Petersburg medical authorities was called by an accident. It appears that a laboring man, who had been drinking heavily for four days and nights, entered in a complete state of intoxication in a grocer's shop, without being conscious of where he was or what he was doing.

Unnoticed by the shopkeeper, he staggered up to an open cask of petroleum and began to drink from it. With difficulty he was dragged away from the cask, and, seeing the large quantity of petroleum he had imbibed, it was expected that he would fall down senseless and be seriously ill. Instead of this, however, it is related that the petroleum had cured him of all the ill effects of overdrinking, the nausea, unsteadiness of gait and headache disappearing as if by magic. In fact, it is stated he left the shop sober and quite another man as compaetd with what he was before he took the draught of petroleum.—London Lancet.

Wilder's Latest Story.

"Once upon a time," said Marshall P. Wilder to a group of interested Englishmen in his hotel, "a little nigger sat at a table pounding his thumb nail with a hammer," and the famous story-teller screwed his face into comical grimaces expressive of recurring pain, while his hands went through the motions suggested by the story.

"Presently," he continued "a man asked him what he was doing that for?"

"'Cause,' whimpered the negro, "it feels so good when I stop!"

"August Flower"

What is It For?

This is the query perpetually on your little boy's lips. And he is no worse than the bigger, older, balder-headed boys. Life is an interrogation point. "What is it for?" we continually cry from the cradle to the grave. So with this little introductory sermon we turn and ask: "What is AUGUST FLOWER FOR?" As easily answered as asked: It is for Dyspepsia. It is a special remedy for the Stomach and Liver. Nothing more than this; but this brimful. We believe August Flower cures Dyspepsia. We know it will. We have reasons for knowing it. Twenty years ago it started in a small country town. To-day it has an honored place in every city and country store, possesses one of the largest manufacturing plants in the country and sells everywhere. Why is this? The reason is as simple as a child's thought. It is honest, does one thing, and does it right along—it cures Dyspepsia.

THE LOST LETTER.

I have lost the precious letter
That the mail brought yesternight;
Lost it walking through the meadow
Where the clovers are in white.

And if you should chance to find it—
But you would not dream it mine;
For my name is not upon it,
Only "Dearest" in each line.

Who would tell me that he loves me?
Who would say my lips are sweet?
Who would dream the wild wood blossoms
Only wake to woo my feet?

That he fancied threads of golden
In my brown hair's warmest glow,
You might think his eyes were dazzled
By a dart from Cupid's bow.

When he says my eyes have told him
He is dearest of all men,
You would think my cheeks would crimson
So they'd never pale again.

But my name is not upon it,
Only "Dearest" in each line;
And if you should read the letter
You would never dream it mine.
—Cora A. Matson, in the Current.

"I PROMISE."

"Viva! Viva! I must go!"

"You shall not! You shall not! You belong to me!"

The beautiful little creature stamped her tiny foot on the turf; as she spoke: her eyes flamed with anger, a flush shot up into her dark cheek.

"I belonged to my country before I ever saw you, Viva," answered Tom Creighton, in a sad but steady tone.

"You shall not go though! Ah! dear, dear, darling Tom, can you leave your little lassie to die of fear? Don't you love me?"

She gathered the tall fellow's hands close to her heart, and clasped them there with strange, passionate strength. Tom stooped and lifted her to his bosom as if she had been a tiny child.

"I could not love thee, dear, so much Loved I not honor more,"

he said, slowly, bending his head to her ear. A splendid head it was, crowned with close curls soon to fall before the shears, and its symmetry to be hidden by a forage cap; and the face did not belie the head; its strong, regular features, its cleft chin, and resolute lips, all "gave the word assurance of a man," while the expressive gray eyes revealed humor, tenderness, pathos, passion, and a possible flash of rage.

"Don't talk to me about honor!" sobbed Viva, hiding her face on his shoulder. "I shall die if you go away from me! I can't—I can't bear it!"

There was no heroism about Genevieve L'Estrange; her French descent had given her inexpressible charms of aspect and manner; she was as slight as a girl of ten years, and no higher than her lover's shoulder, but the contours of her exquisite figure showed the roundness and grace of womanhood, and her piquant, glowing face was alight with all the fire of an intense feminine nature. There was nothing childish in the red, mobile lips, the delicate, irregular features, the brilliant dark eyes that sparkled or melted according to her mood, the abundant, silky black hair that fell to her feet when it escaped from the heavy coils that seemed too weighty for the lovely little head they covered.

She was spoiled from her babyhood, being the only child of wealthy parents; not a wish had the wilful creature ever been denied; never had she wanted a luxury, or failed to indulge a caprice; indeed, it was a caprice that this very Summer had taken her to the White Mountains before the great hotels were opened, to a small house near the village of Franconia. She wanted to see the Spring blossoms of the North, to gather the dawn pink arbutus, she had so often bought in Broadway, from its lurking-places under the pine needles of the forest; she had heard of "the shy Linnæa," the white wintergreen, and many another early flower that fades before fashion comes to explore its haunts, from a school friend who lived in northern New Hampshire; and so, weary of the early terrors of the great war was looming blackly in the distance, tired from the two years in Europe that followed her school days, and the long winter of dissipation in the city, she had intimated to her obedient parents her desire to visit Franconia; and they took her to the Pine Hill House accordingly.

Here she met Tom Creighton; his father and mother lived on a farm near by, and the handsome young lawyer from New York had come up to say good-by to them; for he had enlisted in a volunteer regiment and daily expected orders to the front.

Viva had met him often in society, and the two opposite natures, in a measure counterparts, had been mutually attracted. Tom Creighton was a typical New Englander, strong obstinate, enduring with a rigid sense of duty as his dominant trait. He did not entirely approve of the war, for he was naturally conservative; but he considered that he ought to go and go he would. It was a thorough surprise to both the pair, this meeting among the mountains; and it was the last thing Tom Creighton intended, to fall in love with Miss L'Estrange, much less to let her know it, but he could not help himself; with characteristic impetuosity she lost her heart in these solitudes, where all the real character of the young man showed itself, no longer overlaid by the customs of society. She saw how true, how tender, how brave he was; how superior to the society men who had bored her in New York. She had indeed distinguished him there from a certain superiority of aspect, but now she knew and loved him, and showed it with such naive simplicity that Tom, for all his good resolutions, broke down and fell at her feet. Only a day had their engagement been made known when the summons Tom expected came. Viva was almost frantic. It was the first time in her life that her will had been useless; but now it beat against a rock.

Tired with the vain struggle, repeated till Tom's heart ached to its depths, she at length recognized that his strength of character must dominate hers; and after a long, wild flood of tears and a convulsion of sobs, she said at last:

"If you will go—if you must—promise me to live, to come back!"

"I promise to come back if I do live, Viva. How can I say I will live? That is the chance of war and the will of God."

"Promise, promise!" she shrieked. "You must promise me to live! I shall die here, right in your arms, unless you do!"

Her pallid face, her streaming eyes, the sobs that seemed to rend her slight shape, the piteous curve of her red lips, took him by storm. The lovely, unreasoning, willful creature, torn by a passion of love and grief all for him, shook his strong soul to its centre. What man ever resisted such overwhelming passion, or thought it foolish when he was its object? Tom Creighton's soul blazed in his eyes as he held that tiny figure closer to his breast.

"I promise," he said.

So he went and she stayed. The fortunes of war befell him; but in battle he seemed to dodge the bullets that rained upon him, manfully as he fought, for he felt Viva's imploring eyes upon him. "Crieghton's luck" was the jest of the decimated regiment; but no man charged him with cowardice. The thrill and splendor of this new life had swept off his conservatism; the war justified itself by its dash and valor. He rejoiced in the clangor of trumpets, the roar of its guns, the rush of its charges; and when the miasma of the marshes where he lay encamped defied and seared his flesh with fever, when he lay half-conscious for many a week in the hospital, the will to live, the intent to keep his word to Viva saved him. The nurses wondered to hear but two words in the low mutter of his delirium: "I promise—I promise!" but those words were his talisman.

Once in the field he became a wonder of alertness; hairbreadth escapes seemed to be his forte. One day, when the battalion were entrenching themselves, and the commanding general, weary with the march, had dismounted and thrown himself under a tree for a moment's rest, Col. Creighton—for he had been promoted—dashed up on his black mare and saluted.

"General," he said, "shall I ride out beyond the lines and reconnoitre the lay of the land?"

"Do so," said Gen. B., springing up; "and I will go with you."

As they both trotted past the intrenchments a colonel in command called out to them:

"The evening is not far off. Do not risk your life, general."

The general smiled and looked at Creighton, who laughed; and on they went. Soon the pickets were passed, but no enemy was sighted, and, led on by the beauty of the way, as a desire to grasp the situation, they trotted fast down a wood road, turned a short corner, and behold! twenty or thirty men, a picket guard, or, rather, a reconnoissance of the foe. Quicker than a lightning flash, no pause to think, no word said, except that "I promise," branded on his inward ear, Creighton's sabre flashed from its sheath; and whirling it round his head, he looked over his shoulder and shouted, "Forward! Charge!"

And putting spurs to his horse flew forward, the general instantly seconding his ruse and close beside him, rushed upon the startled enemy, who fled like sheep. Once out of sight the two men turned and ran their horses to the lines; but that swift manœuvre saved a general to the army and a lover to Viva.

So it was in the prison where scores of men died of untold agonies; for in those dreadful depths Tom Criegton lived. When his heart and flesh failed he seemed to see Viva's upturned, woful face, and he said to himself, "I promise," with fresh strength each time; for he had learned faith in himself. At last the war was over; but thoroughly wedded to a soldier's life, and because a proverb among men for courage and quick resource, he was transferred to the ranks of the regular army, given a furlong of six months, and flew at once to Viva.

Poor Viva! the war had spared her Tom, but both her parents had died during his absence, and she was quite alone. To describe their meeting would be sacrilege; it was even as the meeting of those who arise together at the rising of the dead and look at the dawning of that heaven which they shall spend together. Naturally Tom desired to hasten their marriage, and Viva did not refuse; for except a salaried chaperon, she was quite alone in that loneliest of positions, the inmate of a fashionable boarding-house. She did not care to waste her time or her strength on an elaborate trousseau, she left all that to Mrs. Merwin; it seemed to her that she could not exist out of Tom's presence. Yet one day she could not see him; she was ill; she only saw the doctor, an old man, who had watched her from childhood.

"Viva," he said to her, as he drew on his gloves after an hour at her bedside, and as the nurse hurriedly called in, had left the room on some needful errand.

"Viva, you must tell Capt. Creighton."

"I will not!" she answered, angrily.

"But you must!"

"I never will! After all these wretched years of waiting, do you think I will throw my life away, Dr. Sands?"

"If you do not, I shall."

"You won't! you can't!"

"But I shall. It is my duty. If you do not tell him before Saturday—this is Tuesday—I shall."

The doctor's voice was stern, but the nurse came in; he said no more.

Next day came Tom with startling news; he was ordered at once to Fort Stilling, the garrison there was needed in a struggle with the Indians; fresh troops must man the fort; there was not a day to spare.

"Viva, will you go with me" she lay, pale and sweet, after her way of escape from Dr. Sands.

"Yes indeed. I will. You shall not leave me again, Tom!"

So the next morning early, like a pair of eloping lovers, they were married in the near church and took the morning train for the far West; on and on the rushing wheels bore them: day after day they endured the separation of the crowd, till at last they arrived at St. George one Winter night in January. The snow was deep, but Tom must report as soon as possible, and Viva would not let him go alone.

"It is too cold, dearest," he said.

"Not with you Tom."

"Forty below zero, Viva!"

"If you can live in it I can. 'I promise' Tom,"

He could not refuse her after that word with all its memories. Rolled in furs, veils, scarfs, with hot bricks at her feet, they set out on their twenty-mile journey. Warned not to speak, for the air was not fit for their lungs to admit in. all its chill, silently they sped along The glittering fields of sparkling snow, on which the moon made a long wake of glory, the black shadows, the creak of their swift runners, the snorting of the horses, whose nostrils were hung with icicles, all added a strange terror to the drive, a drive that seemed endless, but at last it was over.

"Come!" said Tom, holding out his arms as the driver drew up before the officers' quarters, where the light of a fire blazed through the deep frosted windows, but Viva neither spoke nor moved.

Mad with terror, Tom lifted her from the sleigh and rushed into the door, making his way by instinct to the fire. Viva stirred not an atom. Hasty hands unrobed her, kind hands laid her on the sofa. Her face was set and white, her lips parted, her eyes glazed. The post-surgeon hurried in, he lifted one hand, it fell back, he put a finger on her pulse. "My God! she is dead!" he said, with a look of dreadful pity.

Tom dropped beside her.

Was it a year? Was it a lifetime? Was he in heaven when he awoke out of that?

She was there, warm, sweet, rosy.

"You made me promise, Tom; I did not die."

Tom turned on his face and wept like a very child; his heaven had come on earth.

Post-surgeons do not know everything any more than any other man. The fact was that Viva had developed in the last two years a tendency to catalepsy—the result of an overworn and overexcited nervous system; and when Dr. Sands told her she must tell Tom about it, she had just come out of a serious attack wherein she had lain for hours as one dead; but she would not tell him, having an idle fear that Tom might cease to love her.

The long journey and the cold drive had brought on a severe seizure, and she certainly, in appearance, justified the post-surgeon's opinion; but before morning she had come back to herself, and was heart-broken to find Tom delirious with grief and as unconscious of her presence as she had been of his.

"Viva," he said, a few days after they were fairly settled in the new life, "my darling! my wife! think what might have happened if I had never known about this. Promise me, Viva, hereafter to trust me. Tell me everything!"

She looked up in his troubled, tender face with a divine smile, and softly said over his talisman, "I promise."—Rose Terry Cooke, in Exchange.

SILVER COLLARS.

Put Around the Necks of Slaves Centuries Ago

In the London Gazette for March, 1685, there is an advertisement to the effect that a black boy of about 15 years of age, named John White, ran away from Col. Kirke on the 15th inst. "He has a silver collar about his neck upon which is the Colonel's coat of arms and cipher. He has upon his throat a great scar," etc. A reward is offered for bringing him back.

In the Daily Post of August 4, 1720, is a similar notice: "Went away the 22d of July last, from the house of William Webb, in Limehouse Hole, a negro man, about 20 years old, called Dick, yellow complexion, wool hair, about 5 feet 6 inches high, having on his breast the word 'Hare' burned. Whoever brings him to the said Mr. Webb shall have half a guinea reward and reasonable charges."

Again, in the Daily Journal for September 28, 1728, is an advertisement for a runaway black boy. It is added that he had the words "My Lady Bromfield's black in Lincoln's Inn Field's" engraved on a collar round his neck.

The degrading custom of decorating male and female slaves in England with a collar bearing the name and designation of their owners had the example set for it in a high quarter.

There still exists at Hampton Court the bust of a favorite slave of King William III., the head of which is of black marble, while encircling the throat is a carved white marble collar with a padlock, in every respect like a metal dog collar.

In the Museum of the Antiquarian Society in Edinburg there is a specimen of those slave collars, although in this case the wearer of the collar was not a black man, but a white. The collar bears the following inscription: "Alexander Stewart, found guilty of death for theft, at Perth, December 5, 1701. Gifted by the Justiciaries as a perpetual servant to Sir John Erskine, of Ava."

That a collar was considered as essential for a black slave as for a dog is shown by an advertisement in the London Advertiser for 1756, in which Matthew Dyer, working goldsmith at the Crown in Duck lane, Orchard street, Westminster, intimates to the public that he makes "silver padlocks for blacks or dogs, collars," etc.

LUCRETIA BORGIA.

Some Interesting Facts in Connection With That Historic Personage.

The distinguished art critic and historian of renaissance, M. Charles Yriarte, has attempted in the Figaro what may be called the rehabilitation of Lucretia Borgia. Thanks to Victor Hugo and Donizetti, the public in general has not a very high opinion of the daughter of Pope Alexander VI. and the sister of Caesar Borgia. But all through so-called history runs a strong current of legend, which is apt to sweep away the facts and leave a substratum of fancy. "Was Lucretia Borgia really a Messalina and a Julia?" asks M. Yriarte, "holding the cup of poison with one hand and the poniard with the other?" If we study the annalists of the period—Gregorovious, for instance—we find no trace of poison or poniard; no more than of improper love—at most seven love letters, written to Bembo, poet and cardinal, which English misses may read without the use of a fan, in the glass case of the Ambrosiana of Milan, where also is preserved piously the lock of hair before which Byron went into ecstacies. Lucretia Borgia was married at 13 to a nephew of the Sforza, Giovanni, lord of Pesaro, who was 26. Owing to the irruption of the French into Italy, soon after their union in 1493, the course of politics caused an annulment of the marriage, to which the vatican lent itself with the cynical morality of the epoch.

To revenge himself the outraged husband launched against Lucretia's father a frightful accusation, which may be regarded as the foundation of subsequent leglends. The young beauty became henceforth the shuttlecock of politics. Being in need of the alliance of Aragon, who was reigning at Naples, the people made a union between his daughter and a natural son of Alphonse II., king of Napler. He was reputed to be the handsomest prince of his day in Italy, being at that time 17 and his wife 18 years of age. Owing to the jealousy Lucretia's brother Cæsar Borgia, the handsome Alphonse was strangled in the apartments of his father-in-law, Alexander VI. In 1500. Lucretia wedded for the third time another Alphonse, son of Hercules duke of Ferrara. At that time she was 20, and remained to her death, seventeen years later, the "pearl of spouses." Apart from the fleeting breath of scandal, which attributed to the princess two lovers at the court of Ferrara, the chroniclers find nothing whereof to accuse the golden-haired beauty. So (says M. Yriarte) that we are forced to the conclusion that all her manifold wickedness must have been committed between the ages of 13 and 20, a supposition not easily credible even in that precious epoch.

The Milkman's Horse.

A certain milkman had to deliver his milk every day in the week, Sundays included. After he had made his rounds he would drive with his family to church on Sunday. On this particular Sunday he left his horse before the house of one of his customers in Rockville; when he came out of the house his horse and milk cart were gone. When found, the horse and cart stood in the accustomed shed at the church, some four miles away, all safe and sound.

Now, how should that horse know that that particular day was Sunday? for he was performing his accustomed duties daily and there was nothing to remind him that that particular day was for him to attend church.

Even birds can count. The jackdaw will count as far as three. Let four men enter a bower where he feeds and then one of them go out these birds will not go to the feeding place. Or let two come out—it is the same. But let three go out, leaving the fourth concealed behind in the thicket, and the jackdaws will fly down for their feed. They can't count beyond three.—Hartford Times.

Possesses Marked Business Ability,

A youth in West Ninety-first street, New York, displays an aptitude for business rather remarkable for one of his years. "He visits stationery stores and solicits the privilege of taking home all the second-hand paper-covered novels the shopkeeper may have for the purpose of covering them with manilla paper. Then," reports the Recorder, "he canvasses the neigborhood stores along Columbus and Amsterdam avenues and secures advertisements from butchers, bakers, grocers, bell-hangers and so on at 50 cents each. These he places inside the covers, writing them with a pen in a bold hand and making them conspicuous by novel arrangement of the lines and the oddity of the lettering. He charges the stationer nothing for the binding and places the title of each book on its front cover in attractive style. He is doing a thriving business, making money enough to purchase his own clothing, pays for his modest amusement and bhas a bicycle besides. The lad lives with his parents and attends school regularly. The business instinct is so largely developed in him that he can canvas for 'ads.' with all the assurance of one old at the business. The storekeepers readily see that the announcement of their wares on the covers of these books repays them, as the books are, after covering, loaned on the circulating library plan by the stationers and in constant demand by the ladies of the neighborhood."
